Prefatory Note

THE majority of these essays originally appeared in The Times Literary Supplement; others in the Nation and Athenæum, the London Mercury, the Dial, and the New Republic. I have to thank the editors of these periodicals for permission to reprint them.

Many of them were written on the occasion of anniversaries. There is something arbitrary, therefore, in grouping them in a single volume; and yet perhaps their association is not really quite so accidental as may at first sight appear. The year 1821, in which Dostoevsky, Baudelaire, Flaubert, and Amiel were born, was obviously a crucial moment in the spiritual history of the nineteenth century; and these four men, animated by a similar spirit of disillusion, are best understood in relation to one another. Dostoevsky, it is true, is treated only incidentally in this volume: but I may be allowed to refer the reader to my earlier book, Fyodor Dostoevsky: A Critical Study.

The two essays on Shakespeare, the one as general as the other is particular, deal with what is essentially the same subject; while the two essays on Clare and Collins are complementary, as exhibiting two directly contrasted types of poetic sensibility.

Underlying all the essays in this volume is a theory of the psychology of literary creation, which is expounded in greater detail in a series of lectures on 'The Problem of Style,' recently published. A few shorter essays are included, either because they are examples of the application of this theory or because they make clear my conviction that a theory of this kind, whether mine or another, is necessary to literary criticism, if it is not to be incoherent and spasmodic.

Two objections were frequently made by reviewers to the volume of essays, Aspects of Literature, to which this is the successor: first, that the principles on which it was based were not more elaborately and philosophically expounded; second, that it contained relatively little criticism of contemporary writers. The answer to both these objections is the same. A professional critic is almost entirely at the mercy of occasion. There are many things he would like to do which he cannot afford to do; instead, he spends a great deal of his life writing brief criticisms in which he is forced to mutilate his own opinions, theories, and ideals. This condition of things may easily seem more deplorable than it actually is; for, though it is pleasant to dream of a time when the exhaustive discussion of literary theory and practice will find an eager and appreciative audience, when the critic's tacit assertion that fine books and fine poems are not produced every week will no longer be thought to prove that he is lacking in sympathy, or even in common human kindness, the fact remains that compulsion has produced far more good literary work of every kind than the unembarrassed pursuit of an artistic ideal has ever done. And though it would be extravagant to urge that the struggle against arbitrary limitations in which a modern critic is engaged is the same as that exhilarating contest with a stringent literary form which is the condition of some of the greatest triumphs of literature, the likeness between them is sufficient to enable the critic to feel that, on the whole, he gains more than he loses by the effort.

Shakespeare and Love

Shakespeare and Love

IN a very interesting essay recently published Professor Herford discusses Shakespeare's attitude to love and marriage, and insists upon what he calls the profound 'normality' of the poet's conception of love. He points out that love is but seldom the substantial theme of Shakespeare's greater tragedies, and that Shakespeare conceives it as a condition which, so far from inevitably containing the seed of its own disruption, is so naturally strong that it needs the invasion of an alien power to be prevented from the bliss of perfect fulfilment. If we may translate Shakespeare's idea of love into terms he would certainly not himself have used, we may say, following out Professor Herford's view, that Shakespeare instinctively thought of love as a principle of order in the human world, which could be thwarted from its true purpose only by forces foreign to itself. Professor Herford concludes:—

'Shakespeare certainly did not, so far as we can judge, regard sexual love (like some moderns) as either the clue to human life or as in any way related to the structure of the universe. But if instead of these abstract questions, we ask whether any poet has united in a like degree veracious appreciation of love in its existing conditions with apprehension of all its ideal possibilities, we shall not dispute Shakespeare's place among the foremost of the poets of love.'

Countries of the Mind

That is, in substance, a singularly just conclusion, and yet, we think, it will strike a reader of Shakespeare as a little cold. It would, perhaps, scarcely have occurred to him that Shakespeare's place among the foremost of the poets of love should be disputed; and it is not unlikely that his natural impulse would be to call Shakespeare the greatest love-poet of them all. For the love of many other great poets, 'the love which moves the sun and the other stars,' is a wonderful and mighty power, but it is hardly love. It bears the name only by a sublime analogy; it is no native of the earth. Shelley's distracted life was proof of that, if proof were needed.

But in Shakespeare love is not cold and celestial; no icy flame of the amor intellectualis dei burns frozen at its heart. It is warm and human, and generation after generation of men and women to whom the intellectual love of a Dante, a Spinoza, or a Shelley would be an unintelligible fantasy have recognised it as a reflection of something they had felt or might hope to feel. If we take that which ninety-nine out of a hundred of all sorts and conditions of men feel or dream or understand at the word love, as the rough ore of the mysterious element, and if we refine this to the utmost of our power, casting nothing away that truly belongs to it, then of the recognisable universal love which remains Shakespeare is the pre-eminent poet. Nor is this love less ideal because it has nothing of the abstract-metaphysical in its composition, unless we are to hand over the word

'ideal' to the tender mercies of the philosophers. Shakespeare's conception of love is ideal in the most humane sense of the word, an enchanting and attainable perfection of the real.

Tradition, the popular voice, the judgment of the critics are at one in regarding Shakespeare as the poet of the earthly felicity of love. For this he was 'sweet' and 'gentle' in his own day, as he is in ours. The evidence of the plays is beyond all doubt. It is not a question of scattered lines or single characters, but of the general sentiment pervading all his plays: it cannot be escaped; it is the very air we breathe in them. Yet in this there is something strange, something miraculous almost; for whatever may be our estimate of the precise value of the Sonnets as autobiography, it is impossible for any one but a briefed advocate to assert that they do not substantially contain the record of the poet's own disaster in love. That earthly felicity of love between man and woman which runs, with but a single moment of interruption, like a thread of gold through the work of Shakespeare the dramatist, would seem to be the one aspect of love of which knowledge was denied to Shakespeare the sonneteer. He seems to have tasted only the despairs, the degradations and the bitternesses, even though it was he also who declared his faith in the loyalty of a true lover's heart.

'Love is not love

Which alters when it alteration finds

Nor bends with the remover to remove.'

Countries of the Mind

If we seek a simple explanation of the fact, we shall say, well knowing that we trespass against Signor Croce's canons of criticism, that the sonnets of tormented love belong to the moment when the golden thread in the plays is suddenly and unexpectedly snapped. We shall hold that the Sonnets represent an episode in Shakespeare's experience which caused a momentary but a complete overclouding of the reflection in the mirror of the plays. The episode passes and the reflection becomes calm and serene once more. The Sonnets give us, as it were, a year of Shakespeare's attitude to love; the plays give us a lifetime. In other words, even in this single matter of love, it is a mistaken effort to measure the plays by the Sonnets; what we have to do is to measure the sonnets by the plays. If we do this the sonnets of disastrous love seem to fall naturally into place in that period of profound disturbance which is expressed in Hamlet, in Measure for Measure, in Troilus and Cressida, and in All's Well that Ends Well. No doubt this disturbance had its manifest reactions in realms of Shakespeare's faith other than his faith in love; it may have been the proximate cause of his greatest tragedies. But for these we need not assume an origin in personal catastrophe. Moreover, in the great tragic period Shakespeare's faith in love has manifestly begun to reassert itself. We have only to imagine Antony and Cleopatra written in the mood of Troilus and Cressida to understand what Shakespeare actually chose to do with a theme that would have lent itself magnificently to all the bitterness of an outraged heart.

If we put aside the plays of this period of disturbance, which ordinary readers and literary critics alike have felt to be discordant with Shakespeare's work as a whole, we discover pervading the rest an attitude to love which all cynics and most critics have conspired to describe as romantic. It is true that it appears to flower most divinely in what we call the romantic comedies; but that does not mean that the love portrayed in them is romantic in essence. Classification of this kind is superficial and confusing. A poet uses the most convenient plot as the foundation on which to build up the expression of his emotional attitude. The mere accident that the plot contains improbable coincidences and enchanted islands cannot affect the substance of the attitude expressed by its means. The romantic comedy of one poet may be a trivial indulgence of the fancy, while that of another is the flashing of a warm light into the verity of the human soul. We have only to compare Shakespeare's comedy, on the one hand with Beaumont and Fletcher's, and on the other with Ben Jonson's, to discover how far asunder they are in their poetic truth. The segregation of Shakespeare's comedies is misleading unless it is considered merely as the distinction of an aspect within the whole work of Shakespeare. The most immature of his comedies is nearer in spirit to the most perfect of his tragedies than it is to the comedies of Jonson or

Countries of the Mind

Fletcher, whatever merits of their own these may possess.

To call the love of Shakespeare's romantic comedies itself romantic is meaningless, or it is the expression of a private and personal conviction concerning the nature of love. It may mean that in the opinion of the judge love is not in fact so happy, nor so secure, nor so deeply irradiated with the heart's delight as Shakespeare represented it; but it can mean nothing more. And we cannot tell whether Shakespeare himself believed that love actually was as he chose to represent it. But we can say that he did believe either that it was so, or that it ought to be so; and that he found it natural to create men and women who are alive with a reality no other created characters possess, who love in the way he chose to make them love, with a tenderness and a gaiety, an open-eyed confidence in themselves and the future, a shyness and a humour, a marvellous equality in affection, which have made them for a whole world of mankind the embodiment of their experience if they were happy in love, or of their dreams if they were disappointed. And this love, which is as solid and as ethereal, as earthly and as magical as a rose in full bloom, is in all his early comedies; it is essentially the same in A Midsummer Night's Dream as in Much Ado about Nothing. We can hardly say more than that the light changes from moonlight to full sunshine as we pass from Lysander and Hermia, through Orsino and Viola, to Benedick and Beatrice, and that when we reach As You

Shakespeare and Love

Like It the midday brightness is faintly mellowed with afternoon. Nor is it possible to say that the love of the Merchant of Venice or of Romeo and Juliet is of another kind, though the one is calm and the other tempestuous. It is only the tempest of circumstance which wrecks the love of Romeo and Juliet. There is a peculiar ecstasy in their surrender to the enchantment, which bursts out like a flame at the clash of contact between the enemy houses; but in their love no seed of disruption or decay is visible, much less of disaster. Theirs is a love of which all human foresight could prophesy its

‘Outliving beauty’s outward with a mind
That doth renew swifter than blood decays.’

They are the victims not of their passion but of crass casualty; they are fortune’s fools, not their own. ‘Romeo and Juliet,’ as Professor Herford truly says, ‘appears not to be the tragedy of love, but love’s triumphal hymn.’

The love which shines so gloriously through this period of Shakespeare’s work is as mysterious and natural as birth. It is a thing that happens; to ask why it happens is to wait till doomsday for an answer; and if these lovers ask each other, they can only make up jesting replies. When Phebe applies Marlowe’s line to her own love of Rosalind-Ganymede, she speaks for them all, men and women alike.

‘Dead Shepherd, now I prove thy saw aright:
Whoever loved, that loved not at first sight?’

Countries of the Mind

For the most part they know themselves what has happened; and even where, as with Benedick and Beatrice, we seem to know it before they do, it is only because of their shyness of themselves and each other, which will not suffer their heads to confess the truth of their hearts. The moment that Benedick and Beatrice open fire on one another we know that they are caught. It is only love that makes a man and a woman single out each other for such teasing.

‘ Beatrice. I wonder that you will still be talking,
Signior Benedick; nobody marks you.

Benedick. What! My dear Lady Disdain, are you yet living? ’

Benedick might have called her the dear lady of his heart and had done with it, for he gave himself as completely away in that address as he could ever have done in the sonnet they found in his pocket at church, in which no doubt he rhymed, as he feared to rhyme, ‘ladies’ and ‘babies.’ Yet, though Much Ado About Nothing has precisely the same radiant substance as the rest of the love-comedies—love at first sight—it stands apart from them because the drama itself consists in the delicate working out of the psychology of this heavenly condition. It is not entangled with alien accidents, and owes nothing to the enchantment of disguise; it deals with an absolute perfection of art, with the process by which the message of unhesitating love steals from the heart to the mind. For this cause it is at once the simplest and the subtlest of all Shakespeare's comedies of love. For once Shakespeare chose to communicate the reality of love to us realistically: we can imagine the essence of the play—for what does Don John matter?—being played in real life at this very moment in the garden of any kindly country house; the process is as old as the hills and as new as the morning.

But generally Shakespeare preferred to let one of his lovers or both know at once what had happened to them. The recognition is as quick as the love of Celia and Oliver.

‘Your brother and sister no sooner met but they looked; no sooner looked but they loved; no sooner loved but they sighed; no sooner sighed but they asked one another the reason; no sooner knew the reason but they sought the remedy.’

The condition is presented to us a thing elemental, inscrutable, which either is or is not. But if it is, Shakespeare can prove to us immediately that it is the true metal. He does not profess to show how it happens; he does something far more difficult; he convinces us that it has happened. He makes his lovers say the simplest and divinest things; they seem to drop sunbeams from their lips. In reality love is too often tongue-tied: Shakespeare gives it speech that seems as natural and magical as love itself. When Orlando says of Rosalind that she is ‘just as high as his heart,’ when Rosalind says that 'men have died from time to time, and worms have eaten them, but not for love,' when Beatrice answers the Prince's 'Out of question you were born in a merry hour,'

'No, sure, my Lord, my mother cried, but then there was a star danced, and under that I was born,'

we recognise the speech of love as surely as the old prophets recognised the voice of the Lord. This is how lovers would speak if they could. What wonder that they should have recognised their spokesman, and with a single voice elected him the poet laureate of love?

So natural is this flowering that we cannot imagine any end to it but the perfect happiness of marriage. These lovers are too open-eyed to be victims of the sad illusion; their felicity is destined to outlive beauty's outward. They seemed to be poised in a balance of perfect equality; yet if we have to pronounce which way the scale imperceptibly inclines we must say it is to the woman's side. The Duke says to Cesario:—

'For, boy, however we do praise ourselves,
Our fancies are more giddy and unfirm,
More longing, wavering, sooner lost and worn
Than women's are.'

Certainly the Duke himself changed his affection quickly from Olivia to Viola; but then we may truly urge that he was in love with Cesario all the while. Claudio suspected Hero suddenly and condemned her violently. But these, after all, are only the subordinate necessities of the romantic fable; they do not determine the quality of the belief with which Shakespeare charged it.

The happiness of the love of the mature comedies passes undisturbed into the married security of Henry IV. and Julius Cæsar. Kate and Hotspur are the proof that marriage, which is the inevitable end of Shakespeare's lovers, born not merely under a lucky but a dancing star, does not mean the end of love-making.

'I' faith I'll break thy little finger, Harry,
An if thou wilt not tell me all things true.'

They are married, and as much in love as when first they met. There is no room for such gaiety between Brutus and Portia. Brutus is caught in a conspiracy, and is venturing his life in an enterprise which Portia feels must bring disaster. Only the anxiety and devotion can appear, but it is equal. Portia knows that her husband cannot resist her appeal to 'the great vow which did incorporate and make them one.'

'Dwell I but in the suburbs
Of your good pleasure? If it be no more,
Portia is Brutus' harlot, not his wife.'

And even in the relation of Mistress Quickly and Doll Tearsheet to Falstaff we catch the undertone of a fidelity not really unworthy to be compared to this. Both these women loved the genial old ruffian, who in his way loved them; and there are moments when nothing in Shakespeare seems to reveal more clearly his faith in the loyalty of love that the words he makes the cockney landlady say of Falstaff's death:—

Countries of the Mind

'Nym. They say he cried out of sack.

Host. Ay, that a' did.

Bard. And of women.

Host. Nay, that a' did not.

Boy. Yes, that a' did; and said they were devils incarnate.

Host. A' never could abide carnation; 'twas a colour he never liked.

Boy. A' said once, the devil would have him about women.

Host. A' did in some sort, indeed, handle women; but then he was rheumatic, and talked of the whore of Babylon.'

Then comes an abrupt and startling change. Suddenly the steady, shining stream of Shakespeare's presentation of love as happiness and loyalty is disturbed and muddled. The moment coincides with a sudden check in the confident advance of Shakespeare as a poet and a dramatist. We are confronted with what we may roughly call 'the Hamlet period,' which includes that strange sosie of Hamlet, Measure for Measure, and Troilus and Cressida, and All's Well that Ends Well. In all these plays there are sustained passages of poetry of poetry of form and content incomparable, in which Shakespeare definitely passes beyond the highest point that poetry had reached before him, or has reached after him. It was no even temporary weakening of his purely poetic powers that assailed him; but we have a sudden sense of loss of all direction, an invasion of bitterness, of cynicism, and of a conscious helplessness. We feel we are in contact with a wounded and bewildered spirit that can see life steadily and whole no more. Shakespeare managed to project this bewilderment out of himself most completely and almost to master it in the realm of art in Hamlet. He concentrated it all in a character, divided in his deepest being against himself, but yet one; nevertheless the play is bewildering: not, we believe, because there may be remnants of an old play in it—Shakespeare had rewritten old plays before without leaving us in any doubt of his dramatic intention—but simply because the attitude to life which every great poet must convey had suffered a chaotic disturbance. We feel the same indecision in All's Well. Here also we are told that the unsatisfactory nature of the whole composed of such brilliant parts is due to its being a revision of an earlier Love's Labour Won. Again we must reply that Shakespeare knew how to rewrite plays; he had spent his life at the business. What we seek to know is the reason why he suddenly began to fail in a task he had performed for years with brilliant success, and was to perform again more marvellously still.

Countries of the Mind

When we find precisely the same fundamental indecision, the same deep hesitation of a mind that can by nature never be more than half-cynical, in the two other plays of this period, against which the defect of rehashing has not yet been urged; when we find that those four plays are as closely united to each other as they are separate from the whole of the rest of Shakespeare's work, we may fairly neglect the hypothetical 'Ur-Hamlets' and earlier versions and stick to what we have. Of these four plays we may say that we do not clearly understand Shakespeare's dramatic purpose or the direction of his sentiment in any of them. Whether the cause of this clouding actually lay, as we ourselves incline to believe, in the love-catastrophe recorded in the Sonnets, is a minor matter; but the fact is that the disturbance is most clearly to be distinguished in his treatment of love. The main intention of Hamlet is on the whole fairly clear. But who has ever spoken convincingly on the significance of Hamlet's love for Ophelia? It remains mysterious to us. The final effect of Troilus and Cressida is a feeling that again Shakespeare could not really face his own subject. For a moment he handles the love of Troilus and Cressida firmly, then he appears to let it drop as though it were unbearable and to turn away to deride the Homeric heroes and the idea of chivalry. In a play which contains, in Ulysses's speeches and Troilus's love addresses, some of Shakespeare's finest poetry, we are struck at the last chiefly by its strange inferiority to Chaucer's wonderful poem. Shakespeare could have handled the love theme with the mastery of his great predecessor; but something prevented him, and the consequence of his hesitation is that essays are now written to prove that he meant only a satire on hero-worship. Seeing that Shakespeare put his finest declaration of the ideal of love into the play, we may assume that this master of love would have worked out the tragedy of love if he could have borne to do so.

Measure for Measure is that one of Shakespeare's plays which Coleridge could never bring himself to like. The treatment of love in it is as near to pure cynicism as Shakespeare could get. Claudio, who really loves, and is loved by Julietta, is sentenced to death for anticipating the marriage he intends. Isabel, who will not sacrifice her icy chastity to save her brother, ends by acting like a woman of the town, but one utterly devoid of the humanity which glows in Doll Tearsheet or Bianca. Believing her brother dead, she pleads for Angelo, the reverend justice who has killed him and would have ravished her, in these terms:—

' Look, if it please you, on this man condemn'd,
As if my brother lived: I partly think
A due sincerity govern'd his deeds,
Till he did look on me; since it is so,
Let him not die. My brother had but justice,
In that he did the thing for which he died:
For Angelo,
His act did not o'ertake his bad intent,

Countries of the Mind

And must be buried but as an intent
That perish'd by the way: thoughts are no subjects;
Intents but merely thoughts.'

It would be difficult to conceive anything more revolting. Dr Johnson's note on it is properly cynical, but it is too good-humoured. The lines contain a fierce and bitter caricature of love, and we must believe that Shakespeare meant it. Then there is the trick, significantly repeated in All's Well, by which Angelo possessed the faithful Mariana in the belief that she was Isabel. And over the whole play hangs the sinister cloud of preoccupation with death, suddenly crystallised into the sardonic figure of Barnardine. Whatever may be the dramatic purpose of this singular 'comedy,' the condition of mind from which it sprang is manifest. Life is hateful and contemptible; and as for love, your bawd is your only honest man.

In All's Well that Ends Well—supremely cynical title—Shakespeare seems deliberately to take revenge on his own idealism of love. He deliberately makes Bertram detestable and shows that the bragging coward, Parolles, is the better man. Then he makes Helena fall in love, passionately, tenderly, delicately, with the unpleasant young nobleman, builds her up as surely as Beatrice or Rosalind, puts into her mouth the divinely hesitating reply to Bertram's purely brutal 'What would you have?'

Shakespeare and Love

‘Something; and scarce so much: nothing, indeed.

I would not tell you what I would, my lord:

Faith, yes;

Strangers and foes do sunder and not kiss.’

Yet after all this she plays the Mariana trick. One wonders what can be the conception of the poet in the minds of those who imagine that he had written a romantic comedy with a happy ending. The self-torturing mood of the play, the bitter mood of ‘I’ll show you a happy ending,’ is only too apparent. But Shakespeare, it seems, could never succeed in projecting an attitude of embitterment completely: his hand weakened, his idealisation of love and humanity interfered. That is why the fascination of the plays of this strange tormented period is out of all proportion to the sureness of their achievement as works of dramatic art.

We may speculate that the true poetic realisation of this period, whose stress we imagine we can measure by Othello’s words—‘when I love thee not Chaos is come again’—is to be found in the great tragedies. The shattering personal experience there found its place in a vision of life as a whole. There is no bitterness any more; and in the microcosm of his vision of life which in his attitude to love it is apparent that Shakespeare has regained his belief. The love of Othello and Desdemona is in itself unclouded. No human mind could resist the villainy of Iago. Their perfect happiness

Yet with his wisdom and his pain of heart, Prospero gives way to the faith and the freedom of love; and his creator looks at the world not through his eyes only, but through Miranda's also.

‘ O, wonder!

How many goodly creatures are there here!

How beauteous mankind is! O brave new world,

That has such people in't! ’

So ‘ the world's great age begins anew.’ The magic of Shakespeare's last enchantment is that he makes us believe that the eyes of love alone can see the miracle; and perhaps it is the ultimate truth of life that indeed they do.

A Neglected Heroine of Shakespeare

A Neglected Heroine of Shakespeare

CORIOLANUS is, if not one of the greatest, one of the most masterly of Shakespeare's plays. If it does not hold all the spiritual significance of any of the three great tragedies, if it has not the profound emotional appeal of Antony and Cleopatra or Julius Cæsar, it indubitably belongs to the same period of serene mastery of theme and expression. French critics continually, and English critics occasionally—these last improperly obeisant before the prestige of French criticism—have said that Coriolanus is Shakespeare's most perfect work of art. While we deplore their language, we understand their meaning. Coriolanus is a magnificent example of creative control. Its design is, as Mr Walter Sickert has well said of Poussin's painting, 'marshalled.' Its economy, its swiftness, its solidity, its astonishing clarity and pregnancy of language are not only satisfying and exhilarating in themselves, but may have a peculiar and profound appropriateness to the warlike argument. Just as the looser texture of Antony and Cleopatra seems to be the inevitable garment of the decaying soldiery of Antony, so the exact and unrelenting pattern of Coriolanus seems essential to the unfaltering decision and the unswerving success of the earlier Roman general. The play marches onward like a legion in the days when Roman soldiers were Romans still.

Perhaps it is this quality of Roman relentlessness

and inevitability which has made it unsympathetic to the general English taste, for among us it is surely the least popular of Shakespeare's great plays. In France, on the contrary, it is said to be the most popular; probably not for the same reason. Beyond the fact that Coriolanus is a familiar and traditional hero of the French theatre, the concentrated and controlled dramatic action which distinguishes Shakespeare's Coriolanus from his other great dramas appeals directly to the French palate. Since, however, this only means that Coriolanus is an unusually well-constructed play, it cannot account for the general reluctance of English people to admit it to their affections. The reason, one imagines, is that it is too Roman. An English audience, and English readers, for that matter, like to surrender themselves to their heroes. They can idolise Brutus as an eloquent Hampden, and sympathise with an Antony lost in the embraces of his serpent of old Nile. A martyr for political liberty, a martyr for love, these are intimate and comprehensible to us; but a martyr to the aristocratic idea is not. He is an alien; there is too much of the British constitution in our blood for him to warm it.

In other, and more familiar terms, Coriolanus is an unsympathetic hero, and all the characters of the play, save one, to whom we shall return, strike chill upon the general heart. Volumnia is altogether too much like that forbidding Spartan mother who haunted our schooldays with her grim farewell, 'Return with your shield or upon it';

A Neglected Heroine of Shakespeare

Menenius is too cynical, too worldly-wise to move us humanly in his discomfiture; Brutus and Sicinius arouse neither sympathy nor disdain; and the emotion we feel at the knightly generosity of Aufidius is dashed too soon by his confession that, if he cannot overthrow Coriolanus by fair means, he will by foul. Coriolanus himself we cannot like, any more than a schoolboy can like Themistocles. One may despise one's country, one may hate one's country, but one may not lead an enemy against her. These are primitive ethics, no doubt, but they are profound, and though they may be alien to æsthetic criticism, they have their roots deep in the human heart. The writer who ignores them deliberately imperils the universality of his appeal.

We can see clearly enough why Coriolanus should be that among Shakespeare's greater plays which is most neglected by the public, and therefore the least familiar to the stage. It is not so easy to understand why it should have been so neglected by the critics, unless perhaps they are not quite so immune from the effects of instinctive sympathy as in theory they ought to be. By the critics I mean the true literary critics, not the textual 'philologists.' These have been busy enough, sometimes to good effect, as with the whole line which they have neatly restored from North's Plutarch, but at least as often in a spirit perhaps best described as one of slight impatience with poetry. This is, however, not the occasion to catalogue the things they have done which they ought not to have done; but only to try to show that they have also left undone a few things that they ought to have done. Far from me at this moment the desire to shiver a lance in open battle with the editors; I only crave their leave to ride to the rescue of an all but vanished lady to whom they have had no time to stretch out a helping hand.

All that needs to be premised is the simple fact that Coriolanus was first printed in the Folio of 1623, and that we have no other authority for the text. On the whole we may say that the Folio text is careless enough, although I believe that—obvious misprints apart—it is at least as near to Shakespeare's original as most modern recensions, which take us as much farther away by some of their readings as they bring us nearer to it by others. The most persistent weakness of the Folio Coriolanus is the haphazard distribution of lines among the speakers. One of the most palpable of these blunders has been rectified by common consent. In Act III. (Sc. 1, l. 237) when Menenius is trying hard to persuade Coriolanus to moderate his contemptuous language towards the plebs, the Folio gives him these impossible words:—

‘ I would they were barbarians, as they are Though in Rome litter'd: not Romans, as they are not
Though calved i' th' porch o' th' Capitol.’

It is as certain that Menenius did not speak them as it is certain that Coriolanus did. They have been properly restored to the hero. The Folio Coriolanus then, although the true and authentic original, is far from impeccable.

So much by way of preamble to the attempt at rescue.

Of all the characters in Coriolanus one alone can be said to be truly congenial; and she is the least substantial of them all. Virgilia, Coriolanus's wife, though she is present throughout the whole of four scenes, speaks barely a hundred words. But a sudden, direct light is cast upon her by a phrase which takes our breaths with beauty, when Coriolanus welcomes her on his triumphant return as 'My gracious silence!' Magical words! They give a miraculous substance to our fleeting, fading glimpses of a lovely vision which seems to tremble away from the clash of arms and pride that reverberates through the play. Behind the disdainful warrior and his Amazonian mother, behind the vehement speech of this double Lucifer, the exquisite, timid spirit of Virgilia shrinks out of sight into the haven of her quiet home. One can almost hear the faint click of the door behind her as it shuts her from the noise of brawling tongues. Yet in her presence, and in the memory of her presence, Coriolanus becomes another and a different being. It is true we may listen in vain for other words so tender as 'My gracious silence!' from his lips. A man who has one love alone finds only one such phrase in a lifetime. But in the heat of victorious battle, when Coriolanus would clasp Cominius in his arms for joy, he discovers in himself another splendid phrase to remember his happiness with Virgilia.

Countries of the Mind

‘ Oh! let me clip ye
In arms as sound as when I woo’d, in heart
As merry, as when our nuptial day was done
And tapers burned to bedward.’

And even in the anguish of the final struggle between his honour and his heart, when his wife comes with his mother to intercede for Rome, it is in the very accents of passionate devotion that he cries to Virgilia, ‘ Best of my flesh!

Forgive my tyranny; but do not say
For that, “Forgive our Romans.” Oh! a kiss
Long as my exile, sweet as my revenge!
Now, by the jealous queen of heaven, that kiss
I carried from thee, dear, and my true lip
Hath virgin’d it e’er since.’

In the proud, unrelenting man of arms these sudden softenings are wonderful. They conjure up the picture of a more reticent and self-suppressed Othello, and we feel that, to strike to the heart through Coriolanus’s coat of mail, it needed an unfamiliar beauty of soul, a woman whose delicate nature stood apart, untouched by the broils and furies of her lord’s incessant battling with the Roman people and the enemies of Rome.

A Neglected Heroine of Shakespeare

In the play Virgilia speaks barely a hundred words. But they are truly the speech of a 'gracious silence,' as precious and revealing as they are rare. She appears first (Act I., Sc. 3) in her own house, sitting silent at her sewing. Coriolanus has gone to the wars. Volumnia tries to kindle her with something of her own Amazonian ecstasy at the thought of men in battle. 'I tell thee, daughter, I sprang not more in joy at first hearing he was a man child than now in first seeing he had proved himself a man.' Virgilia's reply, the first words she speaks in the play, touch to the quick of the reality of war and her own unquiet mind.

'But had he died in the business, madam; how then?'

The thoughts of her silence thus revealed, she says no more until chattering Valeria, for all the world like one of the fashionable ladies in Colonel Repington's diary, is announced. She has come to drag her out to pay calls. Virgilia tries to withdraw. Volumnia will not let her, and even while the maid is in the room waiting to know whether she may show Valeria in, she bursts into another ecstatic vision of her son in the midst of battle, 'his bloody brow with his mailed hand then wiping.' Again Virgilia reveals herself.

'His bloody brow! O Jupiter, no blood!'

Valeria enters on a wave of small talk. She has seen Virgilia's little boy playing. The very image of his father; 'such a confirmed countenance.' She had watched him chase a butterfly, catching it and letting it go, again and again. 'He did so set his teeth and tear it; oh, I warrant how he mammocked it!'

Countries of the Mind

'Volum. One on's father's moods.

Val. Indeed, la, it is a noble child.

Virg. A crack, madam.

'An imp, madam!' The meaning leaps out of the half-contemptuous word. Don't call him a noble child for his childish brutality. It pains, not rejoices Virgilia. Nor, for all the persuasions of Volumnia and Valeria, will she stir out of the house. She does not want society; she cannot visit 'the good lady that lies in.' She is as firm as she is gentle.

'Tis not to save labour, nor that I want love.'

Simply that she is anxious and preoccupied. She will not 'turn her solemnness out of door'; she cannot. Coriolanus is at the wars.

So, in two dozen words and a world of unspoken contrast Virgilia is given to us: her horror of brutality and bloodshed, her anxiety for her husband, her reticence, her firmness. She is not a bundle of nerves, but she is full of the aching fears of love. Truly, 'a gracious silence.'

She next appears when the news is come that

A Neglected Heroine of Shakespeare

Coriolanus has triumphed (Act II., Sc. 1). Volumnia and Valeria are talking with Menenius. She stands aside listening. He is sure to be wounded, says Menenius; he always is. She breaks out: 'Oh, no, no, no!' She retires into her silence again while Volumnia proudly tells the story of her son's twenty-five wounds. 'In troth, there's wondrous things spoken of him,' says chattering Valeria. Virgilia murmurs: 'The gods grant them true!' 'True! Pow-wow!' says Volumnia, in hateful scorn: one can see her sudden turn, hear her rasping voice. Virgilia is not one of the true breed of Roman wives and mothers. And indeed she is not. She is thinking of wounds, not as glorious marks of bravery, but as the mutilated body of the man she adores. Wounds, wounds! They talk of nothing but wounds. Virgilia suffers in silence. Coriolanus is wounded. That is a world wounded to her.

Coriolanus enters, swathed in bandages, unrecognisable. He kneels before his mother. Then he sees Virgilia, standing apart, weeping silently. These are the words of the Folio text. Only the spelling has been modernised; the punctuation has been left untouched.

'Corio. My gracious silence, hail:

Would'st thou have laughed, had I come coffin'd home

That weep'st to see me triumph? Ah my
dear,

Such eyes the widows in Corioli were

Countries of the Mind

And mothers that lack sons.

Mene. Now the Gods crown thee.

Com. And live you yet? Oh my sweet Lady, pardon.

Volum. I know not where to turn.

Oh welcome home: and welcome General,
And y'are welcome all.'

The first two of these speeches and their speakers contain no difficulty. But, obviously, 'And live you yet? Oh, my sweet Lady, pardon,' does not belong to Cominius. On his lips it is nonsense. The editors have resolved the problem by giving the line to Coriolanus, and the following speech of Volumnia to Valeria. Coriolanus is supposed to say to Menenius, 'And live you yet?' then, suddenly catching sight of Valeria, to beg her pardon for not having seen her before.

We have a free hand in disposing of the line. There is no objection to Volumnia's speech being given to Valeria, whose effusive manner it suits better. But to make Coriolanus surprised that Menenius is still alive is pointless; he had no reason to suppose that the armchair hero was dead. Moreover, to make him turn to Valeria, and say, 'Oh, my sweet Lady, pardon,' is to give the great warrior the manners of a carpet knight.

Now think of the relation between Virgilia and Coriolanus; remember how her imagination has been preoccupied by his wounds; see her in imagination weeping at the pitiful sight of her wounded husband—and read the lines through without regard to the speakers. It will, I believe, occur to any one with an instinct for psychology that 'And live you yet?' takes up Coriolanus's previous words. 'Ah, my dear,' he has said, 'it is the women who have no husbands who weep as you do.' Then, and not till then, Virgilia breaks silence. 'And live you yet?' And are you really my husband? Is this thing of bandages the lord of my heart? At her sudden, passionate words, Coriolanus understands her tears. He has a glimpse of the anguish of her love. He has been an unimaginative fool. 'Oh, my sweet Lady, pardon!' This, I suggest, is the way the passage should be read:—

Corio. Ah my dear,
Such eyes the widows in Corioli wear
And mothers that lack sons.
Mene. Now the gods crown thee!
Virg. And live you yet?
Corio. Oh, my sweet lady, pardon . . .
Val. I know not where to turn.'

And to my own mind it is an essential part of the beauty of the passage that these few lightning words of love should flash through the hubbub of Menenius's welcome and Valeria's effusive congratulations.

Virgilia appears again in the scene following Coriolanus's banishment (Act IV., Sc. 2). Here the alterations necessary are self-evident, and it is difficult to understand why they have not been made before. Again the test of reading through the short scene with 'an imaginative realisation of Virgilia must be applied. Again her exquisite timidity of speech must be contrasted, as Shakespeare deliberately contrasted it, with Volumnia's headstrong and contemptuous anger. It will then, I believe, be plain that of Volumnia's final words,

Countries of the Mind

'Anger's my meat; I sup upon my self
And so shall starve with feeding. Come, let's go.

Leave this faint puling and lament as I do
In anger, Juno-like. Come, come, come,'

the last two lines are addressed to Virgilia alone. Besides Volumnia herself only the two tribunes, Brutus and Sicinius, are there. The lines cannot be spoken to them. Only Virgilia remains. She is not angry, but sad, at Coriolanus's banishment, just as in his triumph she was sad, not joyful: and just as then, Volumnia scorns her for her weakness.

Now read again the Folio text, which is that of the modern editions, of lines 11-28. Volumnia meets the two tribunes who have been the prime movers in her son's banishment:—

'Volum. Oh y'are well met:

Th' hoarded plague a' th' gods requite
your love. (10)

Mene. Peace, peace, be not so loud.

Volum. If that I could for weeping, you should hear,

A Neglected Heroine of Shakespeare

Nay, and you shall heare some. Will you be gone ?

Virg. You shall stay too: I would I had the power

To say so to my husband. (15)

Sicin. Are you mankind ?

Volum. Aye, fool, is that a shame. Note but this, fool,

Was not a man my father ? Had'st thou foxship

To banish him that struck more blows for Rome

Than thou hast spoken words.

Sicin. Oh blessed Heavens! (20)

Volum. More noble blows than ever you wise words.

And for Rome's good, I'll tell thee what:
yet go:

Nay, but thou shalt stay too: I would my son

Were in Arabia, and thy tribe before him,
His good sword in his hand. (25)

Sicin. What then ?

Virg. What then ? He'd make an end of thy posterity

Volum. Bastards, and all.

Good man, the wounds that he does bear for Rome!'

It is obvious that the peremptory 'You shall stay too!' (l. 14) is not spoken by Virgilia. It is as completely discordant with her character, and with Volumnia's description of her behaviour during the scene ('this faint puling') as it is accordant with the character of Volumnia. Volumnia forces first one, then the other tribune to stay; we can see her clutch them by the sleeve, one in either of her nervous hands. At her words Virgilia interposes a sighing aside, 'Would I had the power to say so to my husband!'

It is equally clear that Virgilia cannot possibly have indulged in the brutal imagination of line 27. 'What then? He'll make an end of thy posterity.' There is no stop at the end of the line in the Folio; it runs on to the next half line; and the whole line and a half undoubtedly belong to Volumnia. A simple transposition of the rubrics is all that is needed.

'Volum.

What then?

He'll make an end of thy posterity

Bastards and all.

Virg. Good man, the wounds that he does bear for Rome!'

It is another sighing aside and another indication that Virgilia is haunted by the memory of those wounds she could not bear to see. Unless these asides are restored to her, and the brutal words taken away, quite apart from the violation of her character, there is no point in Volumnia's sneer at her 'faint puling.'

Virgilia appears for the last time as the silent participant in Volumnia's embassy of intercession.

A Neglected Heroine of Shakespeare

For the first and only time a bodily vision of her beauty is given to us, when Coriolanus cries

‘What is thy curtsy worth or those dove’s eyes Which can make gods forsworn? I melt and am not
Of stronger earth than others.’

She has no need of words to make her appeal; her eyes speak for her. She says simply ‘My lord and husband!

Corio. These eyes are not the same I wore in Rome.

Virg. The sorrow that delivers us thus changed
Makes you think so.

Corio. Like a dull actor now,
I have forgot my part, and I am out
Even to a full disgrace. Best of my flesh
Forgive my tyranny; but do not say
For that, “Forgive our Romans.” Oh!
a kiss

Long as my exile, sweet as my revenge!
Now, by the jealous queen of heaven, that kiss

I carried from thee, dear, and my true lip
Hath virgin’d it e’er since.’

After this Virgilia speaks but a single sentence more. Volumnia ends her pleading with an impassioned adjuration to her son:—

Countries of the Mind

‘ For myself, son,
I purpose not to wait on Fortune till These wars determine: if I cannot persuade thee

Rather to show a noble grace to both parts
Than seek the end of one, thou shalt no sooner

March to assault thy country than to tread—Trust to't, thou shalt not—on thy mother's womb

That brought thee to this world.

Virg. Ay, and mine

That brought you forth this boy, to keep your name

Living to time.'

Virgilia's words contain much in little space. They, her last words in the play, are the first in which she shows herself at one with her husband's mother. Always before, Volumnia has been angry, contemptuous, spiteful, malevolent towards Virgilia; and Virgilia had held her peace without yielding an inch of ground to Volumnia's vehemence. We have felt throughout that they are the embodiments of two opposed spirits—of pride and love. Not that Volumnia's pride has changed to love; it is the same pride of race that moves her, the fear of disgrace to a noble name:—

‘ The end of war’s uncertain; but this is certain,
That, if thou conquer Rome, the benefit
Which thou shalt thereby reap is such a name

A Neglected Heroine of Shakespeare

Whose repetition shall be dogged with curses, Whose chronicle thus writ: "The man was noble

But with his last attempt he wip'd it out,
Destroy'd his country, and his name remains
To the ensuing age abhorr'd." "

But now these spirits of love and pride are reconciled; for once they make the same demand. Volumnia pleads that her son shall remember honour, Virgilia that her husband shall remember mercy. The double appeal is too strong. Coriolanus yields to it, and pays the penalty.

Not one of the readjustments suggested in this essay calls for the alteration of a single word in the text of the Folio. They consist solely in a redistribution of words among the speakers, and in the most complicated instance a redistribution of some kind has long since been seen to be necessary and long since been made. I venture to think that together they will help to disengage the true outline of one of Shakespeare's most delicate minor heroines. There was no place for a Desdemona in the story of Coriolanus; but in a few firm touches Shakespeare has given us a woman whose silence we can feel to be the unspoken judgment on the pride of arms and the pride of race which are the theme of the play.

For it is surely not against the democratic idea that Coriolanus is tried and found wanting. In spite of Signor Croce's assurance to the contrary, it is impossible to believe that the contempt for the city mob with which the play is penetrated was not shared by Shakespeare himself. The greatest writers strive to be impersonal, and on the whole they achieve impersonality; but, though they carve out an image that is unlike themselves, they cannot work wholly against the grain of their own convictions. Prejudice will out. And the loathing of the city mob which is continually expressed in Shakespeare's work and comes to a head in Coriolanus was indubitably his own. It is indeed less plausible to deny this than it would be to argue that at a time when his genius was seizing on themes of a greater tragic scope it was his sympathy with the anti-plebeian colour of the Coriolanus story that led Shakespeare to choose it for his play.

This is not a question of Shakespeare's political views. We do not know what they were, and we have no means of finding out. Signor Croce is thus far right. But when he goes on to assure us that it is a wild goose chase to look to discover where Shakespeare's sympathies lay in the world in which he lived, we can point to the knowledge we actually have of every great writer. We do know their sympathies. It may be an illegitimate knowledge, but the laws it violates are laws of Signor Croce's own devising. It is his own logical fiat that holds the kingdoms of the æsthetic and the practical asunder. In fact, there is no dividing line between them. A writer's predispositions in practical life do constantly colour his æsthetic creation, and every great writer who has been conscious of his activity has either confessed the fact or gloried in it.

We know that Shakespeare detested the city mob. If we care to know why we have only to exercise a little imagination and picture to ourselves the finest creative spirit in the world acting in his own plays before a pitful of uncomprehending, base mechanicals.

‘Alas, ’tis true, I have gone here and there
And made myself a motley to the view, Gored mine own thoughts, sold cheap what is most dear.’

The man who used that terrible phrase, who ‘gored his own thoughts’ to wring shillings from the pockets of the greasy, grinning crowd in front of him, had no cause to love them; and Shakespeare did not. He was an aristocrat, not in the political sense, but as every man of fine nerves who shrinks from contact with the coarse-nerved is an aristocrat, as Anton Tchekhov was an aristocrat when he wrote, ‘Alas, I shall never be a Tolstoyan. In women I love beauty above all things, and in the history of mankind, culture expressed in carpets, spring carriages, and keenness of wit.’

Shakespeare could not therefore measure Coriolanus against the democratic idea in which he did not believe; nor could he pit the patriotic idea against him, for Coriolanus was immune from a weakness for his country. It is domestic love that pierces his armour and inflicts the mortal wound. And perhaps in Shakespeare's mind the power of that love was manifested less in the silver speech of the vehement and eloquent Volumnia than in the golden silence of the more delicate woman to whom we have attempted to restore a few of her precious words.

[SEPTEMBER, 1921.]

Burton's 'Anatomy'

Burton's 'Anatomy'

ABOUT three hundred years ago was published in Oxford, where it had been composed, 'The Anatomy of Melancholy, what it is, with all the kinds, causes symptoms, prognostics, and several cures of it. In three partitions; with their several sections, members, and subsections, philosophically, medically, historically opened and cut up by Democritus Junior.' Within fifty years the original quarto had grown into a folio, passed through eight editions, and—so the story runs—enriched its publisher with an estate. That Robert Burton, the author, student of Christ Church and vicar of St Thomas, Oxford, derived any profit from a book which was the encyclopædia of the men of letters and the diversion of the dilettanti throughout the seventeenth century, there is no evidence and little probability. One can hardly imagine 'the melancholy man' making a profit out of anything.

With the changed taste of the eighteenth century the Anatomy lost its popularity and became the precious possession of the few. Warton imagined that he had discovered in it the source of Milton's Allegro and Penseroso, and he may have been right. Dr Johnson told Boswell—perhaps with a touch of rhetorical exaggeration—that it was 'the only book that ever took him out of bed two hours earlier than he wished to rise'; Laurence Sterne indubitably made good and copious use of it to embellish Tristram Shandy; and at the turn of the century—ten editions carried Burton down to 1800—Charles Lamb was completely convinced that he was caviare to the general. ‘I do not know,’ he wrote of the two-volume edition published in 1813, ‘a more heartless sight than the reprint of the A. of M. What need was there of unearthing the bones of that fantastic great old man, to expose them in a winding-sheet of the newest fashion to modern censure? What hapless stationer could dream of Burton ever becoming popular?’ Lamb should not have lamented; that new edition gained for Burton one of his aptest readers—Keats, who borrowed from it (and properly acknowledged his debt) the story of Lamia, and some of the bitterest eloquence in his Ode to Fanny. Still, though Keats made splendid use of the Anatomy, we may admit that Lamb had a privilege of possession; he was Burton’s ideal reader, and he was almost entitled to supply from his own imagination, as in fact he tried to do, some posthumous fragments from the commonplace book which Burton did not leave behind him.

The one he did leave behind is the Anatomy. For what is that indescribable volume but the true original Patriarch, the undisputed Sovereign, of all commonplace books whatsoever? It professes to deal with melancholy, but what of that? Melancholy is the merest skeleton of a vast body, no more than the principium divisionis of the old logicians; re-shuffle the matter a little, and it would clothe another skeleton just as neatly. It might have been the Anatomy of the Human Soul, except that Burton would have found the title too ambitious; to-day it would appear, if it could appear at all, as Curiosities of Psychology. Quidquid agunt homines—Burton could truly have said—nostri farrago libelli est. But it is the world of human action at one remove, a vast repository of what other men had said and thought about it, a museum of the old style, like the Ashmolean of Burton's century, with statues and monsters in spirits and astrolabes and dried crocodiles, and a puckered old curator explaining, describing, moving among the medley, inscrutable, indefatigable, apparently absorbed. The ghost of a half-smile warns us that he may not be altogether serious, but we can never be sure; and even when he suddenly throws the gown of office aside to pour out the vials of his personal indignation, or to tell us some fantastic tale, he gives us no time to parley. Before our astonishment has passed he has slipped into his fortress of folios, against which we may batter at first in vain.

Assuredly Burton does not believe all he tells us; certainly he believes a great deal. But how much, who can say? His capacity for faith in things outside his experience is large and accommodating. We do not need the evidence of the horoscope which he had carved on his tomb, or the legend which tells that he made away with himself in order to die on his prognosticated day, to know that he took astrology seriously; although in his book he professes to have an open mind concerning the influence of the planets upon human destiny, the undertone of belief is audible. But he is prepared to see astrology pass into astronomy; the Copernican revolution is quite acceptable to him; it sorts not only with his skill in mathematics, but with his temperament. 'If it be so that the Earth is a Moon, then are we also giddy, vertiginous, and lunatic within this sublunary maze.' He believes in the sovereign virtue of precious stones, or at least we may deduce belief from the fact that he quotes all the authorities on the one side and none on the other. He stands at the dividing line between the age of superstition and the age of science; for the nature of evidence (as it is called by the moderns) he cares nothing. Everything is admissible that has been written in a book; and the odder it is, the better for his purposes, provided it has the sanctity of print.

'Being in the country in vacation time not many years since at Lindley, in Leicestershire, my father's house, I first observed this amulet of a spider in a nutshell lapped in silk, so applied for an ague by my mother; whom, although I knew to have excellent skill in chirurgery, sore eyes, aches, etc., and such experimental medicines, as all the country where she dwelt can witness, to have done many famous and good cures upon diverse poor folks, that were otherwise destitute of help: yet among all other experiments, this methought was most absurd and ridiculous. I could see no warrant for it. Quid aranea cum febre? For what antipathy? till at length rambling among authors (as I often do) I found this very medicine in Dioscorides, approved by Matthiolus, repeated by Alderovandus cap. de Aranea, lib. de insectis, I began to have a better opinion of it.'

Even here we cannot be certain that there is no twinkle in his eye, and that the tale is not being told against himself. But since his face is serious while he tells us of a hundred other remedies as odd, we suspend judgment and are content to be grateful for the one little glimpse of his mother, wife of his 'excellent father,' Ralph Burton, Esquire, of Lindley, in Leicestershire, where Robert Burton was born on February 8, 1576.

The little we learn of Burton's life from sources outside his book is useless knowledge. Apart from a meagre handful of dates and the tradition that he used to go down to the waterside at Oxford when his depression was at its blackest and listen to the bargees swearing at one another, 'at which he would set his hands to his sides and laugh profusely,' the chroniclers tell us nothing that we cannot discover better from his own pages. Thence we learn the all-important fact that he had a miserable time at the grammar school (at Sutton Coldfield), where he was 'fractus animis, and moped many times weary of his life.' Probably his school-boy misery was a prime cause of the depression that dogged him for the rest of his life, though he himself apparently preferred to ascribe it to his 'having Mercury misaffected in his geniture.' Yet it is characteristic of him that, in spite of his hateful memories of his boyhood, he had the kindest recollection of the 'excellent air' of Sutton Coldfield. It is indeed doubly characteristic of him; it shows his instinctive desire to remember the best about everything, and also the pathetic pride he took in any local attachments outside Oxford. He had so few, and he made so much of them. In his chapter on the benefits of good air the poverty of the list of places which he knows is remarkable; but he manages to single out for especial commendation of their salubrity where he went to school, where he was parson, and finally where he was born. Thus he praises—

'places best to me known, upon the river of Anker in Warwickshire, Swarston, and Drakesby-upon-Trent. . . . Sutton Coldfield in Warwickshire (where I was once a grammar scholar) . . . in an excellent air and full of all manner of pleasures . . . Segrave in Leicestershire (wh. town I am now bound to remember) is situated in a champaign at the edge of the wolds, yet no place likely yields a better air.'

He goes on to recommend high places; he mentions only three, and one of these, 'which I may not omit for vicinity's sake,' is 'Oldbury in the confines of Warwickshire, where I have often looked about me with great delight, at the foot of which hill I was born.'

A commoner of Brasenose, a student of Christ Church, an inmate of the Bodeleian, Burton seems to have no existence outside Oxford from the end of his schooldays to his death; we think of him first and foremost as the affable, familiar ghost of the old University, flitting from cloister to quadrangle, bewildered and lost if he stirred abroad. If we look more closely, however, we can discern in him a hankering after another life, a tinge of regret for some simpler and less theoretic existence. Though the traces are slight—what writer has more sedulously concealed himself than Burton?—they are conclusive. He never uses the language of affection when he speaks of Oxford; and when he speaks of the University with admiration, as he sometimes does, it is only to greet some startling innovation—the building of the new waterworks, the foundation of the botanical garden, or the establishment of the Bishop in a new palace at Cuddesdon. Had he lived to-day he would assuredly have urged the case for an electric tramway down the High. The beauty of the Oxford countryside is of the rarest, the air of Boars Hill of the finest; he never mentions them. It is of his other homes alone that he writes with love and approbation; and we feel that even his fishing, the only sport he describes with the glow of actual experience and personal delight, was done, not on Cherwell or Isis, but somewhere on that 'river of Anker in Warwickshire.'

'Plutarch in his book De Soler. Animal. speaks against all fishing, "as a filthy, base, illiberal employment, having neither wit nor perspicacity in it, nor worth the labour.” But he that shall consider the variety of baits for all seasons, and pretty devices which our anglers have invented, peculiar lines, false flies, several sleights, will say, that it deserves like commendation, requires as much study and perspicacity as the rest, and is to be preferred before them. Because hawking and hunting are very laborious, much riding and many dangers accompany them: but this is still and quiet: and if so be the angler catch no fish, yet he hath a wholesome walk to the brookside, pleasant shade by the sweet silver streams: he hath good air, and sweet smells of fine, fresh meadow flowers, he hears the melodious harmony of birds, he sees the swans, herons, ducks, water-horns, coots, and many other fowl, with their brood, which he thinketh better than the noise of hounds, or blast of horns, and all the sport they can make.’

Our sense that Burton felt himself an exile in Oxford and cherished some instinctive resentment against the monastic life of the University accords with the impression made by the most persistent of the personal tones which sound through the Anatomy—the bitter complaint of the disappointed scholar. Oxford is a microcosm of the greater world without; advancement goes not by merit, but by favour. He drops into two full pages of Latin to give vent to his indignation.

60

Burton's 'Anatomy'

quâvis contumeliâ, quâvis interim miseriâ digni, qui pro virili non occurrimus. Quid enim fieri posse speramus, quum tot indies pauperes alumni, terrae filii, et cujuscunque ordinis homunciones ad gradus certatim admittantur.'

Any academic honour can be bought for money, and the only thought of the officers of the University is that 'those who commence, whether they are taught or untaught is of no moment, shall be sleek, fat pigeons worth the plucking.' Whether Oxford was indeed as corrupt as Burton describes it we do not know, but it is obvious that he found the atmosphere intolerable. Yet what could he do? If he left Oxford, what had the true university scholar, without money or influence, to expect? He may 'teach in a grammar school at a falconer's wages, ten pounds a year,' or be trencher chaplain in a gentleman's house, for which service 'he may perchance have a living to halves, or some small rectory with the mother of the maids at length, a poor kinswoman or a cracked chambermaid, to have and to hold during the time of his life.' So he looks back with longing eyes to the days before the Reformation, and regrets the wholesale disruption of the religious houses by the too 'zealous innovators.' Had they taken thought for the commonweal instead of their own fortunes they would have preserved at least one in each part of the country, where true scholars might have congregated to pursue their studies in comfort and security and to be a light to the world about them.

Countries of the Mind

Instead of this happy condition the men of learning are herded together, their talents rusted, and their lives unprofitably worn away.

‘ We that are University men, like so many hide-bound calves in a pasture, tarry out our time, wither away as a flower ungathered in a garden, and are never used; or as so many candles, illuminate ourselves alone, obscuring one another’s light, and are not discerned here at all, the least of which translated to a dark room or some country benefice, where it might shine apart, would give a fair light and be seen over all. Whilst we lie waiting here as those sick men did at the Pool of Bethesda, till the Angel stirred the water, expecting a good hour, they step between and beguile us of our preferment.’

Those who know Burton know that this is no merely personal grievance on which he dwells; and those who do not may discern in his regret for the wasted Reformation the outlines of an ideal system of provincial universities which three centuries have not even yet made a full reality. It is customary to conceive him only as a bookworm, winding his way through forgotten authors. He was much more than this. There was a fine, magnanimous spirit in him which chafed at the waste not only of his own life, but of all that humanity and education might accomplish in the world; with this spirit his great volume was impregnated against the decay of time, so that even now, if we will only take the pains to blow the dust off the covers,

Burton's 'Anatomy'

we shall find within a freshness, a savour, and sanity for which we were scarce prepared. For the Anatomy is a deceptive book; it is a museum which we enter in a mood of idle curiosity and leave thinking less about the multitude of strange things collected there than of the man who gathered them together. At first we catch hardly more from the pages of his book than the hint of a strange, faint fragrance, as of a pomander; but the scent is subtle and curious enough to excite in us an eager desire to discover whence it comes, and as we join the scattered evidences together, the character of Burton himself slowly shapes into that of a wise, kindly, romantic man, a disappointed idealist who has begun, after the habit of his kind, to profess a cynicism he cannot maintain. Through the loopholes in his citadel of authorities, the intervals in his quotations from the satirists, his inveterate charity peeps out; he cannot disguise his faith that the purpose of education is to enable common human kindness to play its high part in the world, nor reconcile himself to the uselessness to which he is condemned. He is distressed by his own divorce from life, regretting not only that the university lights burn away in a sterile illumination of each other, but that they are also cut off from happiness by 'the laws and rigorous customs that forbid men to marry at set times and in some places, as apprentices, servants, collegiates.' Throughout his book this demon of regret lurks in the background. Burton, we feel, is precisely conscious of the futility of the huge labour of compiling it; it is not least his complete lack of all illusion about his own occupation which gives the Anatomy its faint but inimitable flavour and makes it not futile at all.

The Anatomy is not a bitter book, but it contains the harvest of much bitterness. There is something naive in Bishop Kennet's statement that Burton wrote it to cure his melancholy but only made it worse, for the Bishop was confounding cause and effect. The book and the melancholy were both largely the outcome of his resentment against his destiny; it was hardly to be expected that a man who had spent twenty or thirty years in erecting a vast monument to his own pitiful lack of true occupation would be made very merry by contemplating the architecture of it. Conditions have changed at the universities now, and it would be manifestly extravagant to suggest that Burton was the archetype of the don; but most Oxford and Cambridge men can remember at least a few Fellows of an older generation who were Burtons in miniature, with something of his inward rage against his own futility, something of his learning, his kindliness, his idealism, and something even of the sub-acid resignation with which he accepted his fate and made mock of it, as in his telling of the charming parable from Plato:—

‘Now for poets, rhetoricians, historians, philosophers, mathematicians, sophisters; they are like grasshoppers, sing they must in the summer and pine in the winter, for there is no preferment for them. Even so they were at first, if you will believe that pleasant tale of Socrates, which he told fair Phaedrus under a plane-tree, at the banks of the river Iseus; about noon when it was hot, and the grasshoppers made a noise, he took that sweet occasion to tell him a tale, how grasshoppers were once scholars, musicians, poets, etc., before the Muses were born, and lived without meat and drink, and for that cause were turned by Jupiter into grasshoppers. And may be turned again, In Tythoni Cicadas, aut Lycicrum ranas, for any reward I see they are like to have: or else in the meantime, I would they could live as they did, without any viaticum, like so many manucodiatæ, those Indian birds of paradise, as we commonly call them, those I mean that live with the air and dew of heaven, and need no other food. For being as they are, their rhetoric only serves them to curse their bad fortunes, and many of them for want of means are driven to hard shifts; from grasshoppers they turn bumble-bees and wasps, plain parasites, and make the muses, mules, to satisfy their hunger-starved paunches, and get a meal's meat.'

No doubt Burton's profound depression had other causes than his own sense of futility. He was born under Mercury, and 'Mercurialists are solitary, much in contemplation, subtile, poets, philosophers, and musing most part about such matters'; this might not have mattered to another man, but Burton happened to believe in the influence of the planets. An astrologer who was born under a melancholy star could hardly avoid being melancholy. Or is it we who are this time confounding cause and effect, and did Burton first cast his horoscope to find a reason for his own depression? It was hardly necessary, for by his own confession the misery of his schooldays was a quite sufficient cause.

‘Parents and such as have the tuition and oversight of children’ (he wisely says) ‘offend many times in that they are too stern, always threatening, chiding, brawling, whipping, or striking; by means of which their poor children are so disheartened and cowed, that they never after have any courage, a merry hour in their lives, or take pleasure in any thing. There is great moderation to be had in such things, as matters of great moment to the making or marring of a child.’

The usher at the grammar school of Sutton Coldfield probably had the first hand in marring Burton. ‘Moped many times weary of his life,’ he lost the courage to confront the world; he became a solitary, a romanticist, a builder of castles in the air. No one was ever more eager to see the curiosities of the world than he, but the only travels he dared to undertake were made among his books; there he indulged himself and voyaged, in the ethereal journey of his magnificent Digression of the Air, to the ends of earth; but it was a pathetic makeshift for a man born in those adventurous days.

Burton's 'Anatomy'

In the language of modern psychology, Burton suffered under an inhibition; his nerve was shattered, and while he watched himself stagnating, chained by his fear of life to Oxford, his resentment against his destiny accumulated. At moments he looked upon himself as one prevented by the ill order of the world from exercising his true gifts, and cried, like Hamlet, that he lacked advancement. It was only partly true; he knew well enough, as many a disappointed don has known since his time, that he had played for safety and achieved it. The bitter knowledge worked 300 years ago as it does now; it made his depression deeper. It was deeper still because his practical gifts were great. There is nothing in the least fantastic about the remarkable Utopia which he describes in the huge preface to the sixth edition, published in 1651-2, twelve years after his death, a preface that has the substance of a dozen modern books; it is hardly a Utopia at all, but rather a detailed programme of enlightened social reform that any benevolent despot might have made a reality. First of all, he would have the wasteful common lands enclosed, 'yet not depopulated,' each peasant having his holding assigned by independent assessors; where no freehold was possible, the tenant should be guaranteed a long lease and a known rent; no taxes on imported necessities; subsidised expeditions of discovery; commercial attachés appointed to the embassies abroad to note any improvement in the useful arts; public maintenance of public works, such as a copious water supply, hospitals for the sick, the old, and the indigent, fire-engines, cemeteries, colleges of mathematicians, musicians, and actors, chemists, physicians, artists, and philosophers, 'that all arts and sciences may sooner be perfected and better learned,' free public schools for all where grammar and languages are taught not by the ordinary tedious precept, 'but by use, example, and conversation as travellers learn abroad'; public trustees, and a public supply of legal aid. But Burton was no egalitarian; his state was to be monarchical, and hereditary honours were to be permitted on condition that they could be freely acquired by men of merit, for he was fully convinced of the justice and expediency of the carrière ouverte aux talents. In the current phrase, he was for equality of opportunity.

'Once more, though thou be a barbarian, born at Tontontec, a villain, a slave, a Saldanian negro, a seignior of Italy, I care not how descended, of what family, of what order, baron, count, prince, if thou be well qualified and he not, but a degenerate Neoptolemus, I must tell thee in a word, thou art a man, and he is a beast.'

And it scarcely becomes us of the present day to declare his idealism unpractical because he made no provision in his State for an army. His reasons for excluding soldiers (though he considered the condition of the world such that the ports and frontier towns, but no others, had better be fortified) have, alas! a curiously modern ring; it is likely to take society a good many centuries more to learn old Burton's lesson on the misery of war.

‘Whilst the statesmen themselves in the meantime are secure at home pampered with all delights and pleasures, take their ease, and follow their lusts, not considering what intolerable misery poor soldiers endure, their often wounds, hunger, thirst, etc., the lamentable cares, torments, calamities, and oppressions that accompany such proceedings, they feel not, take no notice of it.’

The practical wisdom and humanity which are conspicuous in his Utopia are constant qualities of his book: superstitious though he was, his hatred of bigotry and intolerance was intense. All the absurdities and extravagances of the human race are exhibited against a background of kindness and sympathy, seen through a charitable atmosphere that rises almost imperceptibly from the humane precepts he insinuates, and from his beloved habit of balancing extreme against extreme and censuring both. So in the matter of diet—the three doctors he really trusts, he says somewhere, are Dr Merryman, Dr Diet, and Dr Quiet—he is impatient with the epicure: ‘Lucullus’s ghost walks still, and every man desires to sup with Apollo. . . . These Centaurs and Lapithæ toss pots and bowls as so many balls; invent new tricks, as sausages, anchovies, tobacco, caviare, pickled oysters, herrings, fumadoes’—but he cannot approve those who affect 'a too ceremonious and strict diet, being over-precise, cockney-like, and curious in their observation of meats.'

On other questions he would sometimes carry his method of 'snarl and counter-snarl' (as Keats unkindly called it) to the point of appearing to blow hot and cold with the same breath, as in the matter of tobacco:—

'Tobacco, divine, rare, and super-excellent tobacco, which goes far beyond all the panaceas, potable gold, and philosopher's stones, a sovereign remedy for all diseases. A good vomit, I confess, a virtuous herb, if it be well qualified, opportunely taken and medicinally used; but as it is commonly used by most men, which take it as workers do ale, 'tis a plague, a mischief, a violent purger of goods, land, health, hellish, devilish, and damned tobacco, the ruin and overthrow of body and soul.'

The final outcome of all his unwearied, infinitesimal pursuit of the remedy for melancholy, which is only another name for the secret of happiness, is that people should be rational, charitable, and imaginative. Nurses must not frighten children with tales of hobgoblins, nor fanatic preachers terrify grown men and women with thundering threats of everlasting damnation. This rejection of the terrifying sermon was nothing less than a self-denying ordinance, for Burton had not merely a general gift of vituperation but a particular genius for dwelling on hell fire. He suppressed it, however, for this little passage stands solitary in his book, though it is enough to show that he might have rivalled Donne in the kind:—

‘The terrible meditation of hell fire much torments a silly soul. What’s a thousand years to eternity: ubi mæror, ubi fletus, ubi dolor sempiternus. Mors sine morte, finis sine fine ; a finger burnt by chance we may not endure, the pain is so grievous, we may not abide an hour, a night is intolerable; and what shall this unspeakable fire be that burns for ever, innumerable infinite millions of years, in omne ævum, in æternum. O eternity!’

As men must not be terrified by religion, they must not be tortured by convention. He advises other nations to avoid the extreme pangs of love-melancholy by following the liberal English custom of permitting ‘our wives and daughters to go to the tavern with a friend.’ At the last, like a benevolent uncle, after retailing all the vain remedies for the extremities of love-melancholy, he puts his hand in his pocket and brings all his good advice to a golden end: ‘The last and surest remedy, to be put into practice in the utmost place when no other means will take effect, is to let them go together and enjoy each other.’

It is in this famous last section of his book on love-melancholy that Burton reveals himself most plainly as the romantic idealist. Though he claims that he is ‘but a novice, a contemplator only, Nescio quid sit amor nec amo,’ he has his own very positive preferences in this difficult matter of love. It is seldom indeed in the Anatomy that he speaks in his own person; in discussing love he does so three times. He vigorously applauds three actions, and they are three marriages, and—what is more—three marriages of the same fairy-tale kind. First, ‘Great Alexander married Roxane a poor man’s child, only for her person. ’Twas well done of Alexander, and heroically done. I admire him for it.’ Here are the other two:—

‘Leontius, a philosopher of Athens, had a fair daughter called Athenias, multo corporis lepore et Venere (saith mine author), of a comely carriage, he gave her no portion but her bringing up, occulto formæ presagio, out of some secret foreknowledge of her fortune, bestowing that little which he had amongst his other children. But she, thus qualified, was preferred by some friends to Constantinople, to serve Pulcheria, the emperor’s sister, of whom she was baptized and called Eudocia. Theodosius, the emperor, in a short space took notice of her excellent beauty and good parts, and a little after on his sister’s sole commendation made her his wife; ’twas nobly done of Theodosius. Rodolphe was the fairest lady in her days in all Egypt; she went to wash her, and by chance (her maids meanwhile looking but carelessly to her clothes) an eagle stole away one of her shoes, and laid it in Psammeticus the King of Egypt’s lap at Memphis: he wondered at the excellency of the shoe and pretty foot, but more Aquilæ factum, at the manner of bringing it: and caused forthwith proclamation to be made, that she that owned the shoe should come presently to his Court; the virgin came, and was forthwith married to the king. I say this was heroically done, and like a prince; I commend him for it, and all such as have means, that will either do (as he did) themselves, or so for love, etc., marry their children.'

So we think of this old scholar as a fairy godfather, with his visions of mankind made prosperous and happy, eating his heart out in his rooms at Christ Church, for the lack of opportunity to put the world right by a wave of his wand, rummaging through pile after pile of dusty folios in the full knowledge that the end would only be to add one of the largest to the vast array. What solace he found for his depression, save to hear the bargees swearing, we cannot easily discover. Perhaps he derived happiness from sharing the belief of Marguerite of Navarre that 'l'ennui est commun à toute personne bien née'; he certainly believed, as a whole phalanx of romantics have since believed, that depression is the mark of intellectual distinction. 'I am (he says) of that nobleman's mind, "Melancholy advanceth men's conceits, more than any other humour whatsoever," improves their meditations more than any strong drink or sack.' The compilation of the Anatomy did not help him much: his fishing, we are sure, was not done at Oxford, nor his boating—'to take a boat in a pleasant evening and with music to row upon the waters, which Plutarch so much applauds, Eliau admires upon the river Pineus in those Thessalian fields'—on any mortal stream; and even the comfort of drink was denied him. 'Let's drive down care with a cup of wine; and so say I too (though I drink none myself).' We must believe his own italics, though they are hard to reconcile with his remedy against sleeplessness and bad dreams. 'Piso commends frications. Andrew Borde a good draught of strong drink before one goes to bed: I say, a nutmeg and ale, or a good draught of muscadine, with a toast and nutmeg or a posset of the same, which many use in a morning, but methinks for such as have dry brains are much more proper at night.' With wine away, nothing seems left to console him, except it were that pleasant smoke of juniper which 'Bessardus Bisantinus prefers to melancholy persons, which is in great request with us at Oxford, to sweeten our chambers.'

That Burton suffered torments no one can doubt, in spite of the well-known passage in which he paints with delight the pleasures of the voluntary solitariness which 'gently brings on like a syren, a shoeing horn, or a sphinx to this irrevocable gulf.' Facilis descensus Averno; his descent to the depths was easy, but whether it was as delightful as he there describes it, whether indeed he went by that flowery path at all, is open to suspicion. This cry at least comes straight from a soul in pain: 'If there is a hell on earth, it is to be found in a melancholy man's heart. . . . I say of our melancholy man, he is the cream of human adversity, the quintessence, like so many frogs in a puddle.' The heaviest of his pages sparkles with such sentences. His cumulative effects (as in the well-known diatribe on women) are prodigious; he was always ready to gallop off with the dictionary thundering behind him. 'His soul was soused, imparadised, imprisoned in his lady.' 'Tis an inevitable chance, the first statute in Magna Charta, an everlasting Act of Parliament, all must die.' He loved words for their own sake, and he had the faculty, essential to the finest literary style, of making the spiritual physical by precipitating it, often with a violent jerk, into a concrete image.

It is, of course, mere folly to wish that Burton had written other books than the Anatomy, or the Anatomy otherwise; had he not written that book he would have written nothing. He made it, in spite of the myriad authorities he accumulates, after his own image: out of all his folios he managed to build a house which his spirit could comfortably inhabit, hidden away by many leathern doors and recondite passages from the gaze of the curious vulgar. There in the centre of the labyrinth he is to be found, wise, tender, romantic, sensitive, and charitable, hopelessly at odds with a world of which he was afraid. He is a little hard to know, but those who have the patience to persevere with his acquaintance can find for him no readier epithet than lovable; 'a person,' says Antony Wood, 'of great honesty, plain dealing, and charity.' The time of his popularity is long past; we no longer need to ransack the classics, or be saved labour of ransacking them, in order to buttress our lightest word with authority. Still, it is likely that those who used him most cared for him least, for it is not in man's nature to cherish a personal affection for the editor of an encyclopædia from which he steals. We of the present day, who have no ulterior motive in seeking him out, but frequent him solely for our own delight, may have the privilege of knowing and loving Robert Burton for his own sake alone.

The Poetry of William Collins

The Poetry of William Collins

‘THOU diedst, a most rare boy, of melancholy,’ said Belarius over the unconscious body of Imogen-Fidele. It may have been the fascination of a fate which he felt so like his own which allured Collins to make the courageous but strange attempt to compose another dirge in place of the incomparable—

‘Fear no more the heat of the sun
Nor the furious winter’s rages.’

His attempt was, as it was bound to be, a failure; nor is it really a very interesting failure except to those who seek for what clues they can find to the baffling achievement of a poet whose work, though he lived miserably for thirteen years after, was finished at the age of twenty-four.

We must suppose that Collins’s Dirge for Cymbeline, first printed in 1749, was one of his last poems, if not the very last; and we are surprised that he was then farther removed from the Shakespearean simplicity he coveted than he had been as a schoolboy of seventeen.

‘Young Damon of the vale is dead,
Ye lowly hamlets, moan;
A dewy turf lies o’er his head,
And at his feet a stone.

is nearer to perfection of the kind he sought than is—

Countries of the Mind

‘ To fair Fidele’s grassy tomb
Soft maids and village hinds shall bring
Each opening sweet of earliest bloom
And rifle all the breathing spring.’

The line of Cymbeline on which the verse is based—

‘ With fairest flowers
While summer lasts and I live here, Fidele,
I’ll sweeten thy sad grave—— ’

is fatal to Collins’s adaptation. It is not that his dirge has no qualities of its own. It is musical, almost limpid. But it is weak; the emotional impulse is not concentrated and embodied. It visibly trickles away through the porous vessel of poetic commonplace. In Cymbeline Shakespeare himself was sometimes not very far removed from that condition of relaxed control; but concentration was too deep an instinct with him ever to be quite forgotten. ‘I’ll sweeten thy sad grave’ is tense and overflowing in a manner of which he could never wholly lose, and Collins could never—save in one immortal poem—wholly gain the mastery.

We know little of Collins, and the reticence of his poetry is such as makes us feel that even if we knew much more, it would be knowledge of the kind that is irrelevant. His poetry indicates that he was a man preoccupied with his art, and it is easy to imagine that a contributing cause to his final and fatal melancholia was a morbid sense of dissatisfaction with his own work. He was engrossed in it, as far as he could be engrossed in anything; the activity of his mind seems to have been wholly focused upon poetic achievement, and his sensibility seems to have been determined chiefly by his hopes and fears as a poet. At least one half of the Odes in the 1746 volume are addressed to personified emotions to which he aspires to give poetic expression—Fear, Pity, the Passions—to the Manners he longs to represent, or the Poetical Character he desires to emulate. Nothing could more clearly reveal the self-conscious literary artist, for whom his own activity is already becoming an obsession.

The danger of this intense concentration upon a purely literary purpose is an impoverishment of the sensibility. The emotions and perceptions which are the raw material of literature are not themselves æsthetic; they are just ordinary emotions and perceptions, but felt with a keener particularity than those of ordinary men, and often felt when the ordinary man feels nothing at all. The æsthetic emotion supervenes only in the process of projecting them into words which will compel another to feel them again. To accumulate these emotions and perceptions in their proper intensity demands an instinctive abandonment, a complete surrender to experience, of which the self-conscious literary artist becomes less capable as his obsession with his art grows upon him. The æsthetic impulse emerges too soon; it insists on guiding and determining perceptions which can only be profound if they are independent; and in extreme cases it ends by interposing a veil between the artist and the reality, and perpetually prevents the life-giving contact between his sensibility and the unique experiences upon which the significance of his art depends. When Trigorin, in Tchekhov's Seagull, had reached the point at which he could not see a cloud without immediately saying: 'That cloud is like a piano,' he recognised in himself the symptoms of literary decrepitude. A rich creative nature does not need to label its perceptions on the wing; if you stick a pin through a butterfly it dies. Only the nervous and insecure writer feels that he cannot afford to wait.

If at this point of time we are to be scrupulously just to Collins, we must recognise in his work a sensibility overweighted from the beginning by a precious literary instinct. The very perfection of the two schoolboy poems that have come down to us—'Young Damon of the vale is dead' and 'When Phœbe formed a wanton smile'—is disturbing, for they show that the æsthetic impulse had reached the highest point of acuteness long before the sensibility could have established any real contact with experience at all. Those two poems are not excellent imitations; they are perfect achievements. We could put the Phœbe 'sonnet' among the best work of the minor Carolines, and it would easily hold its place.

'When Phœbe formed a wanton smile,
My soul! it reached not here!
Strange that thy peace, thou trembler, flies
Before a rising tear !

The Poetry of William Collins

From midst the drops my love is born,
That o'er those eyelids rove;
Thus issued from a teeming wave
'The fabled queen of love.'

It is only because they happen to know it was the work of a schoolboy that the editors of the anthologies exclude it. And the same is true of Young Damon. Remove the backstairs knowledge of its date and origin, and it would be accepted as a perfect thing of its kind, exquisite in music, beautiful in diction. If we put the evidence of this altogether precocious sense of form together with the self-conscious literary impulse which reveals itself in the majority of the Odes, we see Collins as a man prematurely burdened with a gift of deliberate poetic expression, one whose sensibility could hardly fail to be deadened by the æsthetic preoccupation interposed between it and direct experience. He was prevented from feeling by the impatience of his intense desire to feel.

'O thou, whose spirit most possessed
The sacred seat of Shakespeare's breast!
By all that from thy prophet broke,
In thy divine emotions spoke;
Hither again thy fury deal,
Teach me but once like him to feel. . . .'

So he importunes Fear; but he asks the same thing from Pity. 'There let me oft, retired by day, In dreams of passion melt away.' Or he calls to Nature, 'If but from thee I hope to feel . . .'

Countries of the Mind

It is the perennial cry of the starved sensibility, impotent to break through the barriers raised by its own devouring instinct for artistic perfection. It seems that Collins could have expressed anything, so rich was his technical endowment; yet that endowment came near preventing him from having anything to express at all. One perfect poem, and one only, lifts him out of the ranks of the minor poets; he can only just support the posthumous renown heaped upon him by a tradition of criticism which is unduly impatient of Pope and the Augustans. Collins brings a breath of a diviner fragrance, it has been said over and over again; but is it—save in the one great poem—really more divine? To safeguard ourselves against an ecstasy of wonder at this phœnix in the desert of the eighteenth century, we need to remember—what is too easily forgotten—what Pope could do and did, to reconsider for a moment passages such as these two from The Unfortunate Lady:—

‘ Most souls, ’tis true, but peep out once an age,
Dull sullen prisoners in the body’s cage:
Dim lights of life, that burn a length of years,
Useless, unseen, as lamps in sepulchres;
Like Eastern kings a lazy state they keep
And close confined to their own palace sleep . . .

What tho’ no sacred earth allow thee room,
Nor hallow’d dirge be uttered o’er thy tomb?
Yet shall thy grave with rising flowers be dressed
And the green turf lie lightly on thy breast:

The Poetry of William Collins

There shall the morn her earliest tears bestow,
There the first roses of the year shall blow;
While angels with their silver wings o'ershade
The ground now sacred by thy reliques made . . .'

The second of these passages is on a favourite theme of Collins. It appears in the Dirge for Cymbeline, in the Ode to Thomson, in the stanzas to the memory of Colonel Ross, and in How Sleep the Brave. But only in the last does Collins achieve an expression that is equal to Pope's. In the Ode to Thomson, for instance, he writes:—

'The year's best sweets shall duteous rise
To deck its poet's sylvan grave.'

That is really almost as far from Pope's couplet, 'Yet shall thy grave,' as it is from Shakespeare's 'I'll sweeten thy sad grave.' It is on an altogether different plane. In How Sleep the Brave, it is true, Collins reaches the level of Pope in his handling of the theme.

'When spring with dewy fingers cold
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than fancy's feet have ever trod.'

Perhaps the purity of the phrase 'with dewy fingers cold' lifts those lines by an almost imperceptible degree above the lines of Pope; but it is the fraction of a degree, no more. In treating the commonplace of nature Pope and Collins were on a level. But the earlier lines we have quoted from The Unfortunate Lady, 'Most souls, 'tis true . . .' are of a kind and excellence beyond Collins's range. They touch the intensity and psychological revelation of Donne, and have a sustained perfection of phrasing that Donne never attained.

Countries of the Mind

We may crudely state the relative position thus: if we take away from Collins the Ode to Evening, his remaining excellence would be comfortably contained in a third of Pope's excellence, for besides the commonplace of Nature, Pope was also a master of Wit in the best Metaphysical sense—namely, the striking expression of deep psychological perceptions, the power which could

'the deep knowledge of dark truths so teach

That sense might judge what fancy could not reach—'

and of wit in the Augustan sense, the verbal epigram of an alert mind. Had the Ode to Evening by some malevolent dispensation never existed, no one would now be calling How Sleep the Brave a great poem. It is, indeed, a perfect poem; but there are very many perfect poems of the same scope in the English language, and Collins would have slipped quietly into an honourable but seldom remembered place among their authors. Only the specialist would have occupied himself with looking through those of his pieces which were not in the anthologies, and perhaps even the specialist, no longer forewarned of the quality to look for, would have missed the scattered lines through which the reverberation of a more solemn music is heard.

' Or in some hollow seat
'Gainst which the big waves beat Hear drowning seamen's cries in tempests brought. . . .

Happier hopeless fair if never
Her baffled hands with vain endeavour
Had touched that fatal zone to her denied. . . .

The band, as fairy legends say,
Was wove on that creating day
When He, who called with thought to birth
Yon tented sky, this laughing earth
And dressed with springs and forests tall
And poured the main engirting all. . . .'

Such things as these, which point more directly than the minor perfection of How Sleep the Brave towards the Ode to Evening, would make us feel that if only he had something to say, some deeply felt experience to crystallise, the great poem might come; but it would be a possibility and no more. For if the purity and resonance of these scattered lines is remarkable, the taste, which in the school-boy was almost impeccable, is now a prey to the strangest aberrations. In spite of his sincere, conscious, and passionate pursuit of simplicity, Collins seems to have suffered as much as any one from the rhetorical mièvrerie of the period: even the neighbourhood of his dignified lines could not save him.

Countries of the Mind

‘ I view that oak, the fanciest glades among,
By which as Milton lay, his evening ear
From many a cloud that dropped ethereal dew, Nigh sphered in Heaven its native strains could hear:
On which that ancient trump he reached was hung.’

Let us hope that by the incredible ‘fanciest’ Collins meant something like ‘most dear to the imagination’; only that could save it from being one of the most terrible infelicities in English poetry. And even though Collins was a fine classical scholar and his love of the Greek was one of the chief influences in his idealisation of Simplicity, who comes,

‘ a decent maid
In Attic robe arrayed,’

he seems at the crucial moment to be insensitive to the difference between Greek clarity and English diffuseness and obscurity. When he wrote ‘The fiend of Nature joined his yoke,’ he was not writing English at all, but the jargon of a classical crib;

The Poetry of William Collins

and there is still more striking evidence of this blind spot in his mind in the Ode to Liberty.

‘ O Goddess, in that feeling hour
When most its sounds should court thy ears,
Let not my shell’s misguided power
E’er draw thy sad, thy mindful tears.’

At the bottom of the page Collins printed the line from Callimachus’s Hymn to Demeter, of which the four lines are an expansion, —

Μὴ μὴ ταῦτα λεγῶμεν ὃ δάκρυον ἦγαγε Διοῖ.

By the side of that beautiful line Collins’s version is unmitigated stucco; and it is curiously revealing that he could print them on the page together. At the end of the same ode—to close the account of Collins’s insensitiveness—he borrows from a writer who was to him no less than a classic, from Milton.

‘ Her let our Sires and Matrons hoar
Welcome to Britain’s ravaged shore,
Our youths, enamoured of the fair,
Play with the tangles of her hair.’

To apply to Liberty, the Lady who shall rule the West, the phrase which Milton used of those who preferred the company of Amaryllis and Neæra to the last infirmity of noble mind. Curiosa infelicitas!

This is not to say that Collins’s aberrations

Countries of the Mind

were very peculiar in that somewhat rococo age. Thomson, who had a very considerable influence upon him, had many similar vices of taste. But to compensate he had a creative vitality which could carry them along on its stream; and, to excuse, he had not the classical scholarship of Collins. It is Collins's perceptible striving after classical simplicity, as much as the tenuity of his content, which makes his lapses appear catastrophes. Possibly we ought to put the insecurity of his judgment to the direct account of Thomson, whose intimate friend he had become during the year that preceded the publication of the Odes; but if we do this we ought in fairness also ascribe to Thomson the deepening of content, the sudden breaking through the closed circle of purely literary perceptions which distinguishes the Ode to Evening from the rest of his work. Certainly it was not from Thomson that Collins acquired his sense of form, which came from the classics and Milton, but from Thomson rather than Milton he derived his use of thinly-disguised and awkward latinisms, his 'decent' and 'frequent.' Nevertheless, the evidence is that, on the whole, Thomson's influence upon Collins was quite as much for the good as for the bad. 'Thomson was an inspired poet,' said Wordsworth, 'but he could not work miracles: in cases where the art of seeing had in some degree been learned, the teacher would farther the proficiency of his pupils, but he could do no more.' It was precisely this 'art of seeing' that Collins seems to have learned from him, and it is likely that Thomson gave more than he got in the exchange, though in the passage which Collins directly borrowed from Thomson, he in a certain sense improved on his original. Thomson had written in Winter,—

‘ In vain for him the officious wife prepares
The fire fair-blazing and the vestment warm;
In vain his little children, peeping out
Into the mingling storm, demand their sire
With tears of artless innocence. . . .’

In Popular Superstitions of the Highlands Collins transforms this into

‘ For him, in vain, the anxious wife shall wait
Or wander forth to meet him on his way;
For him, in vain, at to-fall of the day
His babes shall linger at the unclosing gate.’

And Gray was almost certainly working over the same original in the familiar lines,—

‘ For them no more the blazing hearth shall burn,
Or busy housewife ply her evening care:
No children run to lisp their sire’s return
Or climb his knees the envied kiss to share.’

A comparison of the three versions is interesting. The Thomson is weak, but it is particular; he does put a picture before us. Gray at once generalises it, and makes the stanza more resonant. Collins seems to pause half-way; he half generalises; his verse is limpid, but it does not reverberate. It is a perilous kind of purity that he has achieved; it hovers on the verge of emptiness.

Countries of the Mind

Nevertheless it is characteristic of Collins. He was deficient in the faculty of direct perception which best provides the material necessary if the technical process (even the most perfect) is not to operate idly, in the void; he was deficient in the vigour of mind essential to the fresh apprehension and memorable utterance of great commonplace. That he should have snatched a victory from between these two deficiencies seems almost miraculous. But it was not altogether a miracle. A comparison of the Ode on Colonel Ross and How Sleep the Brave shows how much labour went to the making of the perfect little poem, for the Ode is hardly more than a diffuse preliminary version of the poem. Here are the relevant passages of the Ode.

‘ That sacred spot the village hind
With every sweetest turf shall bind
And peace protect the shade. . . .
Aerial hands shall build thy tomb . . .
While Honour bathed in tears shall rove
To sigh thy name thro’ every grove
And call his heroes round. . . .

But lo! where sunk in deep despair
Her garments torn, her bosom bare,

Impatient Freedom lies,
Her matted tresses madly spread,
To every sod, which wraps the dead,
She turns her joyless eyes.'

There are the rough-hewn originals of almost every line in the finished poem.

'How sleep the brave, who sink to rest
By all their country's wishes blest,
When Spring with dewy fingers cold
Returns to deck their hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.

By fairy hands their knell is rung,
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honour comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that wraps their clay;
And Freedom shall awhile repair
To dwell a weeping hermit there.'

At last, though with no added richness of perception, Collins had controlled his materials. The rhetoric is subdued to reticence; he has achieved the simplicity of a fine Greek epigram.

To carry Collins beyond this point, which, though it is a pinnacle, is a pinnacle of minor poetry, not more art but more seeing and feeling were necessary. And, for the great occasion, they came. Throughout the Ode to Evening the epithets are no longer worn; they are exact and revealing, the imperishable symbols of a unique perception.

Countries of the Mind

emotion. Even the one phrase in the poem which at the first glance seems almost archaic—'With brede ethereal wove'—afterwards appears as the successful culmination of other attempts to use an image which fascinated him.

'All the shadowy tribes of mind
In braided dance their murmurs joined. . . .

Beyond yon braided clouds that lie
Paving the light-embroidered sky. . . .'

But to explain the beauties of the Ode to Evening is superfluous. It is a perfect and a great poem. For the one and only time Collins's sensibility was brought into direct contact with a profound experience; for the one and only time he had a deep and particular emotion to recollect in tranquillity, on the embodiment of which he could fitly lavish his art. He had no need to fear the remembered beauties of other poets, for on this occasion the content of his own mind was definite and urgent enough to compel them to submit to his purpose, to abandon their old allegiance and accept his own.

We may regard Collins as an example of the triumphs and dangers of the pursuit of style. Without the apparatus of a perfect technique he would never have been able to build so complete and final a memorial of the emotion which overwhelmed him when at the last it came; but the adequacy of his preparation for it almost scared it away. We might speculate for long and in vain on the question whether he gained or lost on the whole. Were there no Ode to Evening we might confidently say he lost: but that one poem changes everything. We feel that it is the complete and exhaustive expression of a sensibility. A hundred imperfectly realised poems could not balance it in the scale; and there are moments when we are inclined to say that it alone outweighs the whole production of Thomson's richer nature. He, with many times the ore, lacked the power to refine any of it completely; from a single piece, Collins made a poem of pure gold. The pursuit of style is a perilous thing; but without it there is no permanence. 'On ne vit que par le style,' as Chateaubriand said, for style is the name we give to the specific transmutation of the sensibility into the created thing. It is the condition of immortality, and it is the cause that to-day, for one person who reads Thomson's Seasons, there are a hundred who have read and cannot forget the Ode to Evening. [NOVEMBER, 1921.]

NOTE.—It has been pointed out to me by Mr Bruce Richmond that the well-known stanza of the Elegy in a Country Churchyard contains a reminiscence of Lucretius's beautiful lines:—

Jam jam non domus accipiet te laeta neque uxor

Optima, nec dulces occurrent oscula nati

Præcipite. . .

It had not occurred to me; but once suggested the reminiscence is self-evident. The question may also arise whether Thomson, Collins, and Gray had not all of them the same Lucretian original in mind. But the phraseology of Thomson and Collins is against this. I imagine that Thomson's lines were an independent and original imagination, and that Collins consciously imitated them, while Gray had both Thomson and Lucretius in mind. The reduplication of 'in vain' is conclusive for Collins's imitation, while 'the blazing hearth' does not leave much doubt that Gray was thinking of Thomson as well as Lucretius.

In a letter Mr H. O. White, of Sheffield University, corrects my statement: 'We must suppose that the Dirge for Cymbeline, first printed in 1749, was one of his last poems, if not his very last.' The Dirge, says Mr White, first appeared in 1744, in the second and revised edition of the Epistle to Sir Thomas Hanmer; while the version which appeared in 1749, in The Gentleman's Magazine, was garbled. The point of bibliography, in the case of a poet of such little output as Collins, is of unusual importance; and since the same mistake is made in the two most authoritative English editions of Collins's works, Mr White's correction needs to be put on record. I do not think, however, that the alteration materially affects the argument of the essay.

The Poetry of John Clare

The Poetry of John Clare

IN 1820 Messrs Taylor and Hessey published two books whose immediate renown was in singular contrast with their after-fame. Poems Descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery, by John Clare, a Northamptonshire Peasant, ran into four editions within a year; the five hundred copies of the single edition, Lamia, Isabella, and other Poems, by John Keats, were not exhausted till the 'forties. Clare's popularity dwindled gradually into complete neglect; he had been all but wholly forgotten by the time that Monckton Milnes assumed the practical task of impressing upon the world the conviction of the poets that Keats was among the greatest. Quickly the labours of piety were accomplished; within a few years Keats's poetical remains were gathered together, until nothing substantial remained to be added. Clare went on writing indefatigably in the exile of an asylum for nearly thirty years after he had been forgotten, and not till to-day have two young poets set themselves to the task of rescuing all that is valuable in his work.¹

It is not merely because the year and the publishers were the same that we are drawn to think of Keats and Clare together. The association of the great name and the small one has a curious congruity. Keats and Clare both suffered 'a vast shipwreck of their life's esteems,' the one sudden and intolerably tragic, the other lingering and not without a sunset-haze of vaguely remembered happiness. There were elements common to their characters—they were both parvenus in the ranks of men of letters, and they shared a resolution and an independence which became almost intolerant; Keats had an unusual, and Clare a unique knowledge of country sights and sounds; the most perfect poem of each is an Ode to Autumn.

We are inclined to lay stress on the points of resemblance in order that the cardinal point of difference may more plainly appear; for the eagerness with which we welcome this collection of Clare's poetry is likely to be so genuine and so justified as to disturb our sense of proportion. Into a generation of poets who flirt with nature suddenly descends a true nature-poet, one whose intimate and self-forgetful knowledge of the ways of birds and beasts and flowers rises like the scent of open fields from every page. Surely the only danger is that the enthusiasm of our recognition may be excessive; the relief overpowering with which we greet a poet who not only professes, but proves by the very words of his profession, that his dream of delight is

‘ To note on hedgerow baulks, in moisture sprent
The jetty snail creep from the mossy thorn,
With earnest heed and tremulous intent,
Frail brother of the morn,
That from the tiny bents and misted leaves
Withdraws his timid horn,
And fearful vision weaves.’

The Poetry of John Clare

We have indeed almost to be on our guard against the sweet, cool shock of such a verse; the emotional quality is so assured and individual, the language so simple and inevitable, the posture of mind so unassuming and winning, that one is tempted for a moment to believe that while Wordsworth was engaged in putting the poetry of nature wrong by linking it to a doubtful metaphysic, John Clare was engaged in putting it right.

And so in a sense it was. As a poet of nature Clare was truer, more thoroughly subdued to that in which he worked than Wordsworth. Wordsworth called upon the poet to keep his eye upon the object; but his eye was hardly so penetrating and keen as Clare's. Yet Wordsworth was a great poet, and Keats, with whom Clare's kinship was really closer, was a great poet, and Clare was not; and it is important in the case of a poet whose gifts and qualities are so enchanting as Clare's are to bear in mind from the outset the vital difference between them. Wordsworth belongs to another sphere than Clare in virtue of the range of his imaginative apprehension: Keats in virtue not only of his imagination, but also of his art. In one respect Clare was a finer artist than Wordsworth, he had a truer ear and a more exquisite instinct for words; but he had nothing of the principle of inward growth which gives to Wordsworth's most careless work a place within the unity of a great scheme. Wordsworth's incessant effort to comprehend experience would itself have been incomprehensible to Clare; Keats's consuming passion to make his poetry adequate not merely in content but also in the very mechanism of expression to an emotional experience more overwhelming even than Wordsworth's would have been like a problem of metaphysics to a ploughboy.

Clare was indeed a singer born. His nature was strangely simple, and his capacity for intense emotion appears at first sight to have been almost completely restricted to a reaction to nature. The intensity with which he adored the country which he knew is without a parallel in English literature; of him it seems hardly a metaphor to say he was an actual part of his countryside. Away from it he pined; he became queer and irresponsible. With his plants and birds and bees and fields he was among his own people. The spiked thistle, the firetail, the hare, the white-nosed and the grandfather bee were his friends. Yet he hardly humanised them; he seems rather to have lived on the same level of existence as they, and to have known them as they know each other. We feel that it is only by an effort that he manages to make himself conscious of his emotion towards them or of his own motive in singing of it. In those rare moments he conceives of the voice of Nature as something eternal, outlasting all generations of men, whispering to them to sing also. Thus, while he sits under the huge old elm which is the shepherd's tree, listening to 'the laugh of summer leaves above,'

The Poetry of John Clare

‘ The wind of that eternal ditty sings,
Humming of future things that burn the mind
To leave some fragment of itself behind.’

That is the most imaginative statement Clare ever made of his own poetic purpose. He, the poet, is one more of Nature’s voices; and the same thought or the same instinct underlies the most exquisite of his earlier poems, Song’s Eternity, a precious discovery of his present editors:—

‘ Mighty songs that miss decay,
What are they ?
Crowds and cities pass away
Like a day.
Books are out and books are read;
What are they ?
Years will lay them with the dead—
Sigh, sigh;
Trifles unto nothing wed,
They die.

Dreamers, mark the honey bee,
Mark the tree
Where the bluecap tootle-tee
Sings a glee
Sung to Adam and to Eve—
Here they be.
When floods covered every bough
Noah’s ark
Heard that ballad singing now;
Hark, hark,

Countries of the Mind

Tootle tootle tootle tee.

Can it be
Pride and fame must shadows be ?
Come and see—
Every season own her own ;
Bird and bee
Sing creation's music on ;
Nature's glee
Is in every mood and tone
Eternity.'

In many ways that is the most perfect of Clare's poems; it has a poetic unity of a kind that he attained but seldom, for in it are naturally combined the highest apprehension of which Clare was capable and the essential melody of his pre-eminent gift of song. It is at once an assertion and an emotional proof of the enduringness of the voice of Nature. Clare does not, like the modern poet who has chosen the same theme, adduce the times and the seasons and thereby challenge the evolutionary theory; his history is the history of myth. Not the Neanderthal man but Adam and Eve heard the bluecap's same, immortal song; for it is not the fact, but the sense of song's eternity that the poet has to give us. Clare does it triumphantly. Moreover, in this poem, which we believe must henceforward take its place by right in every anthology of English poetry, Clare achieved that final perfection of form which was so often to elude him. The bird-note begins, rises, dies away: and the poem is finished.

The Poetry of John Clare

Clare's music was a natural music ; as with Shelley's skylark, his art was unpremeditated and his strains profuse. He was perhaps never to find a form which fitted his genius so intimately as that of Song's Eternity. His language was to become more coherent and more vivid; but the inward harmony that is essential to a great poem was too often to escape him. He was like a child so intoxicated with his wonderful gift for whistling and his tune that he whistles it over and over again. The note is so pure, the tune so full of delight that we can never be tired; we listen to it as we listen to the drowsy enchantment of the monotony of sounds on a summer's afternoon, for it is as authentic and as sweet as they. The eternity of song was in Clare's blood; and when he recurs to the theme of enduring nature in simple stanzas,

‘ Some sing the pomps of chivalry
As legends of the ancient time,
Where gold and pearls and mystery
Are shadows painted for sublime;

But passions of sublimity
Belong to plain and simpler things,
And David underneath a tree
Sought when a shepherd Salem's springs,

Where moss did into cushions spring,
Forming a seat of velvet hue,
A small unnoticed trifling thing
To all but heaven's hailing dew.

Countries of the Mind

And David's crown hath passed away,
Yet poesy breathes his shepherd skill,
His palace lost—and to this day
The little moss is blossoming still.'

we feel that here, too, is a music that need never end.

Clare's difficulty as a poet, in fact, can and ought to be put baldly; he did not know when to stop. Why, indeed, should he stop? He was either a voice, one of the unending voices of Nature, or he was an eye, an unwearied eye watching the infinite process of Nature; perhaps never a poet consciously striving by means of art to arouse in men's minds an emotion like his own. All the art he had was that which he gained from his recollection of other poets' tunes; the structure of their harmony eluded him, he remembered only the melody. Take, for instance, his extremely beautiful Autumn: the melody comes directly from Collins's famous Ode; yet how greatly Clare enriches it, as though with a material golden stain of autumn! The last leaf seems to be falling at our feet, the last bee zooming in our ears.

'Heart-sickening for the silence that is thine,
Not broken inharmoniously as now
That lone and vagrant bee
Booms faint with weary chime.

Now filtering winds thin winnow through the woods

The Poetry of John Clare

In tremulous noise that bids at every breath
Some sickly cankered leaf
Let go its hold, and die.'

Not only these, but any one of a dozen other stanzas in the poem have a richer mellowness, reveal a finer sensitiveness than any in Collins's lovely Ode. For all that the melody derives from Collins, we are borne away from him to the neighbourhood of Keats's great poem. But Collins had a classical, almost Miltonic, sense of form; what he lacked in the richness of direct perception he supplied by his careful concentration of emotional effect: so that, despite the more splendid beauty of the elements of Clare's poem, we dare not say it is really finer than Collins's Ode. Collins gathers up all his more exiguous perceptions into a single stimulus to emotion: Clare lets them fall one by one, careless of his amazing jewels. Set his Autumn against Keats's three verses, where the imagination has come to crystallise perceptions not less rich in themselves than Clare's into a single symbol—the very spirit of Autumn.

' Who hath not seen thee oft amid thy store ?
Sometimes whoever seeks abroad may find
Thee sitting careless on a granary floor
Thy hair soft lifted by the winnowing wind;
Or on a half-reaped furrow sound asleep Drowsed with the fume of poppies, while thy hook
Spares the next swathe and all its twined flowers;

Countries of the Mind

And sometimes like a gleaner thou dost keep Steady thy laden head across a brook
Or by a cyder-press, with patient look, Thou watchest the last oozy hours by hours.'

Clare could not do that; for Keats had Collins's art and Clare's richness of perception, and he had also that incomparable imaginative power which alone can create the perfect symbol of an overwhelming and intricate emotion.

Yet we need to invoke Keats to explain Clare, and to understand fully why his wealth of perception was refined into so few perfect poems. Collins himself is not sufficient for the purpose; one cannot well invoke the success of a poorer to explain the failure of a richer nature. Keats the great poetic artist, however, subsumes Clare. Careless critics, confusing the life of every day with the life of the poetic mind, rebuke Keat for his lack of discipline. Yet where in English poetry shall we find a power of poetic discipline greater than his, a more determined and inevitable compulsion of the whole of a poet's emotional experience into the single symbol, the one organic and inevitable form? In him were combined miraculously the humanity that can reject no element of true experience and the artistic integrity to which less than a complete mastery and transformation of experience is intolerable. When, therefore, we invoke Keats to explain Clare, when we feel the need to merge Clare into Keats in thought in order that we may discover his own poetic fulfilment, by completing the great pattern of which he is a fragment, we are passing a judgment upon the value and quality of Clare's own work of which the implications are unescapable. It is a fragment, but it is a fragment of the Parthenon pediment, of intrinsic value, unique, and beyond price.

Clare's qualities were authentic and without alloy. It was the power to refine and shape his metal that was denied him; his workshop is littered not with dross but with veritable gold—of melody, of an intensity of perception (truly, his 'mind was burned'), and, more rarely, of flashes of that passion of the pure imagination which is the mysterious source of the magic of poetry. Let our partial quotation of Song's Eternity suffice to prove the quality of his spontaneous melody. For the intensity of perception we may choose at random any page in this book. Is not a picture such as this cast upon 'that inward eye'?

'Where squats the hare to terrors wide awake
Like some brown clod the harrows failed to break.'

Such things are scattered throughout Clare; they range from the quiet vision of the actual, focused by a single word, such as

'The old pond with its water-weed
And danger-daring willow tree,

Countries of the Mind

Who leans, an ancient invalid, O'er spots where deepest waters be.'

to the authentic fancy of

' Here morning in the ploughman's songs is met
Ere yet one footstep shows in all the sky,
And twilight in the East, a doubt as yet,
Shows not her sleeve of gray to know her by.'

How perfect is the image, as perfect to its context and emotion as the 'soveran eye' of Shakespeare's sun! And what of the intense compression of a phrase like 'ploughed lands thin travelled by half-hungry sheep,' precise not merely to a fact, but to an emotion?

This unmistakable core of pure emotion lies close to the surface throughout Clare. His precision is the precision of a lover; he watches nature as a man might watch his mistress's eyes; his breath is bated, and we seem to hear the very thumping of his heart; and there are moments when the emotion seems to rise in a sudden fountain and change the thing he sees into a jewel. 'Frail brother of the morn' to a jetty snail is the tender cry of a passionate lover; there is a delicateness in the emotion expressed which not even Wordsworth could attain when he called upon the Lesser Celandine. It is love of this kind that gives true significance to the poetry of nature, for only by its alchemy can the thing seen become the symbol of the thing felt: washed by the magic tide of an overwhelming emotion, the object shines with a pure and lucid radiance, transformed from a cause to a symbol of delight, and thus no longer delighting the senses and the emotions alone, but the mind. This mysterious faculty is not indeed the highest kind of poetic imagination, in which the intellect plays a greater part in the creation of the symbol ; this emotional creation leaps from particular to particular, it lacks that endorsement from a centre of disciplined experience which is the mark of the poetic imagination at its highest : but it is purely poetic and truly creative.

In this authentic kind Clare was all but a master, and it may even be suspected that his unique gift would have suffered if he had possessed that element of technical control which would have made him a master indeed. For when we come to define as narrowly as we can the distinctive, compelling quality of his emotion, we find that in addition to tenderness we need the word impulsive. Clare's most beautiful poetry is a gesture of impulsive tenderness. It has a curious suddenness, almost a catch in the voice.

‘ The very darkness smiles to wear
The stars that show us God is there.’

We find, too, a still more authentic mark of the tenderness of impulsive love in his way of seeing his birds and beasts as ever so little absurd. ‘ Absurd ’ has a peculiar and delightful meaning in the converse of lovers; Clare's firetail is 'absurd' in precisely the same sense.

Countries of the Mind

'Of everything that stirs she dreameth wrong,
And pipes her "tweet-tut" fears the whole day long.'

And so, too, are his bees—the 'grandfather bee,' the wild bees who 'with their legs stroke slumber from their eyes,' 'the little bees with coal-black faces, gathering sweets from little flowers like stars'; even the riddle of the quail appears to be rather a delicate and lovable waywardness in the bird than a mere ignorance in the man.

'Among the stranger birds they feed,
Their summer flight is short and low;
There's very few know where they breed
And scarcely any where they go.'

A tenderness of this exquisite and impulsive kind might have been damaged as much as strengthened by a firmer technical control; a shiver of constraint might have crept into the gesture itself and chilled it; and perhaps we may touch the essential nature of Clare's emotion most closely in the mysterious and haunting Asylum poem, discovered by the present editors, and called by them Secret Love.

'I hid my love when young till I Couldn't bear the buzzing of a fly;
I hid my love to my despite
Till I could not bear to look at light:

The Poetry of John Clare

I dare not gaze upon her face
But left her memory in each place;
Where'er I saw a wild flower lie
I kissed and bade my love good-bye.

I met her in the greenest dells
Where dewdrops pearl the wood blue bells,
The lost breeze kissed her bright blue eye,
The bee kissed and went singing by;
A sunbeam found a passage there,
A gold chain round her neck so fair;
As secret as the wild bee's song
She lay there all the summer long.

I hid my love in field and town
Till e'en the breeze would knock me down,
The bees seemed singing ballads o'er,
The fly's bass turned a lion's roar;
And even silence found a tongue
To haunt me all the summer long;
The riddle nature could not prove
Was nothing else but secret love.'

Clare is invoking the memory of Mary Joyce, the girl lover whom he did not marry, and who, though long since dead, lived for him as his true wife when he was immured in the asylum. But the fact of this strange passion is less remarkable than its precise quality; it is an intolerable tenderness, an unbearable surge of emotion eager to burst forth and lavish itself upon an object. Whether it was his passion for Mary Joyce which first awakened him to an awareness of the troublous depths of emotion within we cannot tell, for this poem is in itself no evidence of fact. But it bears witness unmistakable to the quality of the emotion which underlay all that is characteristic and unforgettable in his poetry.

When we have touched the unique emotional core which persists throughout the work of a true poet, we have come perhaps as near as we can to his secret. We stand as it were at the very source of his creation. In the great poetic artist we may follow out the intricacies and ramifications of the intellectual structure by which he makes the expression of his central emotion complete, and the emotion itself permanent. In Clare the work is unnecessary. The emotion is hardly mediated at all. The poetic creation is instinctive and impulsive; the love is poured out, and the bird, the beast, the flower is made glorious. It is the very process which Stendhal described, with fitting brilliancy, as la cristallisation de l'amour.

We may therefore most truly describe Clare as the love poet of nature; and we need not pause to explore the causes why nature and not a human being was turned to crystal by the magical process of his love. Those who care to know may find the story woven in among the narrative of Mr Blunden's sympathetic introduction; they can discover for themselves the reason why Clare appears in the world of grown men and women as a stranger and a changeling; why the woman of his dreams is disembodied; why, when he calls to her in his Invitation to Eternity, the present is ' marred with reason '—

' The land of shadows wilt thou trace
Nor look nor know each other's face;
The present marred with reason gone
And past and present both as one ?
Say, maiden, can thy life be led
To join the living and the dead ?
Then trace thy footsteps on with me:
We are wed to one eternity.'

In eternity perhaps a woman, but in the actual Nature was Clare's mistress; her he served and cherished with a tenderness and faithful knowledge unique in the poetry of nature. Like a true lover he stammered in long speeches, but he spoke to her the divinest and most intimate things. Assuredly his lines were cast so that he had no need of woman even in eternity, and perhaps the truest words he ever wrote of himself are those of the poem by which he is most generally known:—

' I long for scenes where man has never trod;
A place where woman never smiled nor wept;
There to abide with my creator, God,
And sleep as I in childhood sweetly slept:
Untroubling and untroubled where I lie;
The grass below—above the vaulted sky.'

The Poetry of Walter de la Mare

The Poetry of Walter de la Mare

SINCE Plato turned his eyes, weary with the flux of things, to a celestial city whose æëry burgomasters kept guard over the perfect and unblemished exemplars of the objects of this bungled world, and a little while after, Jesus told his fishermen that they could find their peace only in the Kingdom of Heaven, where the mansions were innumerable, the subtle and the simple mind alike have been haunted by echoes of an unceasing music and dreams of imperishable beauty. Men's hearts have been swayed between a belief that the echoes and the dreams reached them from a distant eternal world more real than ours, and a premonition that the voice they heard was that of their own soul mysteriously calling them to self-perfection. And even those who have spoken with most conviction and persuasiveness, as though seeing face to face, of the perfect world immune from the rust of time have been the foremost to let fall the warning that their words were a parable. The rare spirits which steer humanity unite within themselves the contrary impulses of men. They live so intimately with their ideals that they are half persuaded of their reality; they think so highly of the soul that a truth for it alone becomes a truth. Therefore they can say in the same breath that the Father's house has many mansions and that the Kingdom of Heaven is within us, and no man can tell for certain whether The Republic is an allegory.

Countries of the Mind

This dream or desire is one of the eternal themes of poetry, not because it is superficially more 'poetic' than any other, but because it contains one of the persistent realities of the soul. For if the soul lives in its own right, having a core of active being, it lives by an ideal. There is no escaping that Kingdom of Heaven which is within you, because it is the condition of the soul's vitality. Once begin to make choice between a worse and a better, and you are inevitably bound to recognise its validity; and to live without making the choice, whatever the intellect may tell us, is not life at all. Life, as we know it, cannot bar the gate against the ideal. If it is a dream, it is a dream we live by, and a dream we live by is more real than a reality we ignore.

But if this opposition of the ideal and the real is one of the great essential themes of poetry, it is also one which yields most to the impress of the poet's personality. Between the one pole of a complete belief in the existence of a kingdom of eternal beauty and imperishable perfection, and the other of an unfaltering recognition that these beatitudes exist in and for the soul alone, are infinite possibilities of faith and doubt, inexhaustible opportunities for the creative activity of art. For, apart from the precise mixture of certainty and hesitation in the poet's mind, one of the sovereign gestures of art is to make the ideal real, and to project a dim personal awareness on to a structure of definite inventions. The sense that we are exiled from our own country, that our rightful heritage has been usurped from us, we know not how, may impel one poet to create his kingdom in words and name it with names, people it with fit inhabitants, and another to record the bare fact of his consciousness as a homeless wanderer.

Mr de la Mare is a poet of the great theme who is distinguished chiefly by his faculty of pressing invention and fancy to the service of his need. He has named his other kingdom with many names; it is Arabia,

‘ Where the Princes ride at noon
’Mid the verdurous vales and thickets
Under the ghost of the moon.’

It is Tartary; it is Alulvan. Queen Djenira reigns there, and when she sleeps, she walks through

‘ The courts of the lord Pthamasar,
Where the sweet birds of Psuthys are.’

Or again it is Thule of the old legend, upon which the poet beautifully calls:—

‘ If thou art sweet as they are sad
Who on the shore of Time’s salt sea
Watch on the dim horizon fade
Ships bearing love and night to thee . . . ’

Within its shifting frontiers are comprised all the dim, debatable lands that lie between the Never-Never country of nursery rhyme and the more

Countries of the Mind

solid fields to which the city mind turns for its paradise, the terrestrial happiness which only a shake of the gods' dice-box has denied:—

‘ Had the gods loved me I had lain
Where darnel is and thorn,
And the wild night-bird's nightlong strain
Trembles in boughs forlorn.

Nay, but they loved me not; and I Must needs a stranger be Whose every exiled day gone by Aches with their memory.’

That, surely, is a kingdom of solid earth. And yet we wonder. Is it not also rather a symbol and projection of the poet's desiderium, his longingness (to use his own word), than an earthly kingdom from which fate has exiled him? We do not wonder long. The peace that comes from the satisfaction of this haunting desire is not to be found in any actual countryside. Nature has no medicinale balm for this unease. The poet himself tells us that he

‘ Oft marvelled who it was that sang
Down the green valley languidly,
Where the grey elder thickets hang.

Sometimes I thought it was a bird
My soul had charged with sorcery;
Sometimes it seemed my own heart heard
Inland the sorrow of the sea.

The Poetry of Walter de la Mare

But even where the primrose sets
The seal of her pale loveliness,
I found amid the violets
Tears of an antique bitterness.'

Wherever the flux of things endures, this antique bitterness endures also. The loveliness of earth comes to the poet with the perpetual shadow of regret; and even the memory of it dissolves into nothingness:—

'... Beauty vanishes; beauty passes;
However rare—rare it be;
And when I crumble, who will remember
This lady of the West Country?'

Life haunted by death, beauty by decay. What remedy will avail against this malady of mankind? Nothing but the courage of a dream. It is fitting, therefore, that the first, and presumably the earliest, of Mr de la Mare's collected poems is an attempt to turn, as all the great idealists have tried to turn, the ephemerality of earthly beauty into a proof of the existence of a beauty which endures for ever:—

'The loveliest thing earth hath, a shadow hath,
A dark and livelong hint of death,
Haunting it ever till its last faint breath.
Who then may tell
The beauty of heaven's shadowless asphodel?'

But how to keep the courage of that dream—

Countries of the Mind

there is the question. The poet belongs to his age; it is not possible for him to elude it. The shadowless asphodel is haunted by the shadows of the earthly flowers that have died. When the delight of fancy and invention has begun to fade where shall the poet place his other kingdom? What if Arabia and Tartary and Thule and Alulvan cease to delight, and Queen Djenira dream no more? Not all the princes of Arabia, with their splendours and their music, can lull the poet's mind into forgetfulness that he seeks not only a symbol, but a satisfaction for his longing. There comes a time when he knows that the delight of discovering a new name is not the delight of discovered peace. The urgent, incessant question begins to dominate; the pattern in the carpet to appear.

The other kingdom is the kingdom of peace, the country where the soul can rest. And now the poet no more makes a triumphant deduction of immortality from mortality, of the eternal from the temporal. He declares his need, but the haven where it will be satisfied is one which no earthly ship will find:—

‘Where blooms the flower when her petals fade,
Where sleepeth echo by earth’s music made,
Where all things transient to changeless win,
There waits the peace thy spirit dwelleth in.’

And so, by nuances almost imperceptible of emotion and expression, we pass from this undiscoverable country to the clear, comfortless conclusion of what we must consider on this and on other grounds to be Mr de la Mare's finest poem. In a sense The Tryst marks the end of his poetical journey. The curve is complete. The dream is only a dream.

The Poetry of Walter de la Mare

'Think! in Time's smallest clock's minutest beat

Might there not rest be found for wandering feet ?

Or 'twixt the sleep and wake of Helen's dream,
Silence wherein to sing love's requiem ?

No, no. Nor earth, nor air, nor fire, nor deep
Could lull poor mortal longingness asleep.

Somewhere there Nothing is; and there lost man Shall win what changeless vague of peace he can.'

On the path of that curve all Mr de la Mare's memorable poetic achievements—and they are many—will be found. On it, too, will be found the greater part of those rhymes for children which, to the casual glance, seem to be eccentric to it. For, as we have said, Arabia is on the same continent as the Never-Never land of the nursery rhyme; they march with one another. They were created to satisfy the same impulse. In the magic kingdom of childhood 'the shadowless asphodel' seemed really to exist, in a realm where all perfections and splendours and beauties persisted without change; and one might truly regard Mr de la Mare's

Countries of the Mind

‘grown-up’ poetry as an effort to recapture the simple certainty of that childhood belief, or to express the regret at the shadows that have encroached upon it. Therefore, his rhymes for children take a definite place in his poetry as a whole, and are also essentially different from other rhymes of the kind; they are the natural, inevitable expression of the poet’s deepest feeling. How natural and inevitable can be seen, if not from the tenor of this exposition, from the final verse of the exquisite poem Dreams:—

‘ What can a tired heart say,
Which the wise of the world have made dumb ?
Save to the lonely dreams of a child,
“ Return again, come! ” ’

To recognise that the dream is a dream, yet to refuse to put it away, this is the vital act of comprehension which animates the enduring part of the poetry of the present age. It is a reflection of our devastating experience and our shadowy faith; for even while we know that the dream is a dream, having no counterpart in the reality without us, it cannot be wholly surrendered because we live by its enchantment. For to live is to make ourselves of a certain quality, to fashion ourselves to a certain temper; and if the dream is impotent to reshape the stubborn world beyond us, its power to work upon our own souls is undiminished.

When we say, therefore, that Mr de la Mare’s poetry is characteristic of the age, it is not in the sense that there is much poetry of the same quality to be found in our magazines and bookshops to-day—there is, alas, very little—but that it makes an appeal to, and in a way satisfies minds which have been tempered by the common experience. The strings have been so tightened that they respond to this touch. At a price we have purchased wisdom; clamour rings empty in our ears, we turn a mistrustful eye upon ambitious structures; superficialities—and these are commonest in the poetry of to-day—inspire in us an extreme repulsion. We respond only to the expression of the truth of our experience, and turn away from the pompous platitude and the laborious paradox which are generally offered to us as poetry.

In the vast wreckage of faiths with which the modern consciousness is strewn, there remains one thing in which we may believe without fear of disillusion; we may believe in beauty. We may even in the exaltation of despair, say with conviction that the wreckage of our hopes and the ruin of the world is beautiful. But the effort of contemplation so austere and self-regardless is too great to be maintained; we have not the strength to be Spinozas for more than a moment. And, even if we cannot make our beauty so all-inclusive we can still believe in the more partial and more human beauty we discern. But the condition of our belief is that we shall not deceive ourselves. Beauty is transient, we cannot by doting make it changeless. Where changeless beauty exists, there, indeed, our home may be; but we have only a dim memory of it to set against the certainty that the road leading back has been lost for ever.

Nevertheless, and in spite of the regret with which beauty must ever be attended, the faith in it endures; for the discernment of beauty is a mode of perception that is adequate to all the fates can bring. Disillusion has no power against it; it can not merely conquer, but make part of itself its regret for its own impotence. If it inspires men to build dream cities whose walls are proof against ephemeral corruption, it also inspires them to discover beauty in the recognition that their city is unsubstantial.

-Fy

‘ And some win peace who spend
The skill of words to sweeten despair
Of finding consolation where Life has but one dark end;
Who, in rapt solitude, tell o’er
A tale as lovely as forlore,
Into the midnight air.’

This winning of peace that haunts the mind of the poet is nothing other than communion with beauty. And if this beauty, which in spite of all can still be discerned and won, yields but a precarious peace, where the brave dream of youth promised one that would be secure, it could not well be otherwise, and the lovers of beauty are perhaps more fortunate than the lovers of justice, or love.

In Mr de la Mare’s poetry we discover a trembling poise between the longing for an eternality of beauty and an acquiescence, an almost ecstatic acquiescence, in its transitoriness. Between those two conditions lies the gamut of emotional suggestion on which he plays with a consummate skill. They correspond to the deep, antithetical realities of the soul that have vexed men and poets and philosophers through the ages. The old debate between the One and Many is indeed changed, as it must be in the glancing mirror of an artist's mind. It is no longer a question which is true, but which the poet desires to be true. And can he tell? How shall he really choose between the static, eternal beauty whose ghost haunts the beauty that vanishes and passes, and the beauty which has sorrow 'more beautiful than beauty's self' to attend its passing?

The one whispers to the heart of the man; the other is a magnet to the soul of the artist. The beauty the poet perceives, the transitory gleam at which he snatches, cheats him with a mirage of unchanging perfection, of an imperishable beauty beyond the beautiful thing; yet the peculiar preciousness of the gleam he captures, comes not least from its mortality. It is, indeed, more beautiful because it is evanescent. No lasting comradeship with happiness could bring half the enchantment of the vision of

‘ Joy, whose hand is ever at his lips
Bidding adieu.’

And if poets have indulged the child and the man within them with memories of the clouds of glory which they trailed, and the thought that here they have no abiding city, they have done it in part in order that they may more exactly respond to the strange quality of their true condition. If we can once persuade ourselves that we are princes of the blood-royal who wander unknown in rags, how much keener grows our sense of the infinite variety of life's vicissitude. It is, in short, neither the ideal nor the real which fascinates the true poet, but their incessant and conflicting interplay. Each is a light which illuminates the other with 'an unearthly gleam'; without the real to give it substance, the dream is clear, calm, and colourless; without the dream to give it shadow, the real is a vague and confused chaos.

Beauty, which we may truly worship, is a jewel of many facets. It gathers the radiance of the Many; it diffuses the ray of the One. The poet seeks to borrow both its powers, according to his mood; and we may contrast and compare his moods, but to find them contradictory is to make ourselves guilty of the old crime of seeking logic where logic has no place. Mr de la Mare writes symbolically of the soul:—

' Why did you flutter in vain hope, poor bird,
Hard-pressed in your small cage of clay ?
'Twas but a sweet, false echo that you heard,
Caught only a feint of day.

Still is the night all dark, a homeless dark.
Burn yet the unanswering stars. And silence brings

The Poetry of Walter de la Mare

The same sea's desolate surge—sans bound nor mark—

Of all your wanderings.

Fret now no more; be still. Those steadfast eyes,

Those folded hands, they cannot set you free;
Only with beauty wake wild memories—

Sorrow for where you are, for where you would be.'

There beauty diffuses the radiance of the One,
vexes the soul with the memories of a lost perfection. Man, like the Adam of another poem, 'still must roam a world where sin and beauty whisper of home.' But in Fare Well, which is the envoy to the collection called Motley, beauty appears as the power which gathers the radiance of the Many and brings to the soul the comfort of a fleeting,
but earthly, paradise:—

'Look thy last on all things lovely
Every hour. Let no night
Seal thy sense in deathly slumber
Till to delight
Thou hast paid thy utmost blessing;
Since that all things thou wouldst praise
Beauty took from those who loved them
In other days.'

Yes, Mr de la Mare belongs to that company which has sought 'the spirit of beauty in all things.' It is a quest which, followed in singleness of heart, takes the great poet into strange countries by strange roads. And if Mr de la Mare has not yet been led into the wilderness, never stumbled across the temple floor to face the awful question of Moneta, he has none the less given a perfect expression to some of the deepest and most characteristic moods of this generation.

Countries of the Mind

‘Arabia Deserta’

‘Arabia Deserta’

IT is strangely and appropriately exhausting to read steadily through the two stout volumes of Doughty’s Arabia Deserta. There are no suave and saving mists to mitigate our contact with that grim, basaltic waste, whose inhabitants seem to live in some close communion with the primeval rock of which their deserts are made. At most, to vary the deadly clarity of this ‘seeing of a hungry man,’ we find traces of a fever passing over his vision, troubling it indeed, but troubling it only in such a way that it becomes for the moment superhumanly, menacingly clear—the reflection of a brightness through a burning crystal.

Travels in Arabia Deserta is a great book for the simplest and most sufficient of reasons: it is a direct enlargement of human experience. The burden of the new experience is at times all but intolerable. We are made to suffer torments of thirst, of hunger, of heat, of the fanatical cruelty of men. Nothing is interposed between our sensitiveness and the barren, yet austere beautiful reality, and if there are moments when the strange reality is bathed in the quality of a dream, it is because the traveller’s most enduring flesh and blood had reached the limit of its power. It is a dream to us because it was a dream to him.

Part of the fascination of the book lies, no doubt, in the indomitable courage of body and soul of the self-effacing man who hides behind it; but it is only because this twofold courage was transformed (yet without losing its peculiar and unfamiliar virtues) into a courage wholly of the world of art that we are able to surrender ourselves to the influence of the personality of which the book is so complete an expression. For Arabia Deserta is a triumph both of art and of personality. All great books are that, in some degree; yet the duality holds good of Mr Doughty's masterpiece in a peculiar and perhaps unique sense: for Mr Doughty is rather the writer of one great book than a great writer. He is a man who, whether by good fortune or careful choice, found the subject pre-eminently fitted to his character and his gifts; who realised his opportunity and his responsibility, and devoted himself entirely over a long space of years to the task of completely crystallising his sensibility about the core of a subject which he recognised to be mysteriously congenial.

We feel, indeed, that no other theme could have called forth the whole of Mr Doughty's powers. His poems, remarkable though they are, are fragmentary and uneven in comparison with Arabia Deserta; their pure and pellucid beauties are too often hidden away in the crannies of a complex structure and an obscure language which the author's imaginative power has not been sufficient to dominate or to fuse. Mr Doughty's imaginative range is essentially narrow, and this very narrowness, which has made of his poems a comparative failure, has been one of the most potent elements in the triumphant achievement of Arabia Deserta. Here, in the attempt to record imperishably the lineaments of a secret and inhospitable land and of the people it has produced to be its denizens, was no need of that elasticity of the imagination which is necessary to great poetry. The needs were opposite to this: first, of that amazing courage of body and spirit which enabled him to wander unfriended for two years among nomad tribesmen, in whom the traditional hospitality fought ever a doubtful battle with their hatred of the Christian, and whose living (even when they were friendliest) was of a harshness and scarcity hardly imaginable to the European; then, in order to understand and sympathise with them, of a measure of that religious sternness which daily threatened him; and, last and greatest, of the patience to hammer out of the English speech a language apt to render this strange, ageless Semitic world, where the shadows of mind and earth are black and the lights glaring, where there is neither haze nor hesitation, and the thoughts of three thousand years of Western civilisation are utterly unknown.

From what we have called, somewhat roughly and ungraciously, Mr Doughty's narrowness all these needs could be supplied. His own disposition was towards spiritual issues made, to a modern sense, inhumanly clear. Against fanaticism he could pit a stubbornness which itself seems little short of the fanatical; to strike against the religious rock of the Arabs he found steel in himself.

Countries of the Mind

‘And as we drank around they bade me call myself a “Misslim,” and in my heart be still of what opinion I would (this indulgence is permitted in the koran to any persecuted Moslemin)—words not far from wisdom; and I have often felt the iniquitous fortune of travelling thus, an outlawed man (and in their sight worthy of death), only for a name, in Arabia. It had cost me little or naught to confess Konfuchu or Socrates to be apostles of Ullah; but I could not find it in my life to confess their barbaric prophet of Mecca, and enter, under the yoke, their solemn fools’ paradise.’

Indeed, the elements of a martyr were in Mr Doughty, and many were the times toward the end of his pilgrimage when he came within a hairbreadth of what had been martyrdom of the purest kind; and the very straitness of his detestation of Islam brought him nearer than any politic complaisance could have done to an understanding of those for whom Mohammed is truly the prophet of God. Again in his predilections in the English language itself Mr Doughty knows no compromise; he is, one might fairly say, an Old Believer; Spenser first, and Chaucer second, are his gods and there is none beside them. For him the magnificent efflorescence of the language of Shakespeare and Milton might never have been; hardly even the English Bible.

Such then was the man who measured himself with unknown Arabia—a man of a higher and more enlightened tradition, but of a similar basic austerity. No man more proof against the assaults of Arabia ever entered into her; and none more fitted by temper, or by experiences to be endured by that temper alone, to be her patient recreator. None ever compromised less with the Arabs; none was ever more respected by them. If we have regard, therefore, either to the quality of the achievement in Arabia Deserta or to the evident character of the man who wrote it, we are not surprised that ten years went to its composition. It is, as it were, hewn painfully out of the rock or hammered out of stubborn iron; never, even when Mr Doughty handles his language with the most assured mastery, does an all but imperceptible sense of strain depart from it, and the ensuing tension is essential to the story he has to tell, the emotion he has to convey. An effort is demanded of the reader which corresponds (in another kingdom) to the effort demanded of Mr Doughty; an effort richly rewarded, as was his own. No slovenly attention will suffice to receive the message of this marvellous description of a summer day in the Arabian desert:—

‘Now longwhile our black booths had been built upon the sandy stretches, lying before the swelling white Nefud side: the lofty coast of Irnan in front, whose cragged breaches, where is any footing for small herbs nourished of this barren atmosphere, are the harbour of wild goats, which never drink. The summer’s night at end, the sun stands up as a crown of hostile flames from that huge covert of

couldst thou take such journeys into the fanatic Arabia ? ” ”

From this, the first sentence of the book, we are lost, as though lifted on a magic carpet out of time, to wander in an ecstasy of desolation through regions which have not changed since the world began, to consort with Abraham and the sons of Abraham as they were, but for their coffee and their guns, infinite ages ago. No wonder then that even to the traveller himself, as the pangs of hunger lightened the ballast of his brain, the life became as a timeless dream.

‘ Hither lies no way from the city of the world, a thousand years pass as one daylight; we are in the world and not in the world, where Nature brought forth man, an enigma to himself, and an evil spirit sowed in him the seeds of dissolution. And looking then upon that infinite spectacle, this life of the wasted flesh seemed to me ebbing, and the spirit to waver her eyes wings unto that divine obscurity.’

Yet this is a dream where things become not soft and vaporous but of an awful solidity: the vast volcanic table-lands of basalt rock, jutting through the kinder sand, are not more gaunt than the fanatic hatred of the Moslem for the Nasrany that looms always behind even the most ceremonious hospitality of the tents. It would have been less than human if the wanderer’s spirit had never come near to failing, and he had never asked in despair: 'Wherefore should I macerate my life continually in the greatest jeopardy? Or suffer this distress of soul, to kick against the fanaticism of the whole Ishmaelite country?'

Behind, incessantly lifting and maintaining the book, is the man. The singular unity of the artist and the man makes it impossible for us to regard the book for long merely as one of the finest examples of English artificial prose. It is that indeed, and we have to keep this aspect before our eyes in order rightly to appreciate his solitary and so long neglected achievement. But the garment of his style fits the man so closely that unless we diligently remember the ten years' labour we may lapse back into thinking that the writing was natural in the common sense of the word. Because we can see that only Mr Doughty could have forged and manipulated this language, we may persuade ourselves that the work was easy, though in fact nothing is harder in literature than to impress upon our minds the sense of a strong and coherent personality.

Nevertheless, though Arabia Deserta must in the last resort be judged as a work of deliberate art, and though it will stand for many years on the rock of this rare excellence, there is a danger of neglecting its simpler virtues as a story of adventure. It is not possible to regard the thrilling sequence of ever more desperate encounters at Hayil, at Kheybar, at Aneyza, and the final jeopardy outside Mecca when even the hidden pistol, Doughty's last resource, was torn away, and the sudden drop into the final calm of the Sherif's kindly reception at Tayif, as ordered by a sense of artistic culmination. Mr Doughty, we feel, sticks close to the facts. But the collaboration of events toward the single effect is almost bewildering. We are borne irresistibly along to the utmost limits of one man's endurance. The traveller, we feel as we follow him on the last journey from Aneyza to the confines of Mecca, must be saved or he will die, if not by the sword of the ruffian Salem, from the sheer weakness of a broken man. It has been too much; we are oppressed and weary with the horror of the unequal struggle.

To read Arabia Deserta is to live out a whole life in the Arabian waste, and to reach the end fordone. The interludes of peace in the nomad tents and of bountiful beauty in the oases were too few to give the traveller back his strength; at each stage some vital force had ebbed that could not be restored. But the beauty of these resting-places appears to us in the barren meagreness about as a celestial enchantment.

'Oh, what bliss to the thirsty soul is in that light, sweet water, welling soft and warm as milk from the rock! And I heard the subtle harmony of Nature, which the profane cannot hear, in that happy stillness and solitude. Small, bright dragonflies, azure, dun, and vermilion, sported over the cistern water ruffled by a morning breath from the figgera, and hemmed in the solemn lava-rock. The silver fishes glance beneath, and white shells lie at the bottom of this water world. I have watched there the young of the thob shining like scaly glass and speckled: this fairest of saurians lay sunning, at the brink, upon a stone; and oftentimes moving upon them and shooting out the tongue, he snatched his prey of flies without ever missing.—Glad were we when Jummar had filled our girby of this sweet water.'

With a like more than human sweetness amid the fierce fanaticism appears the kindness of the few who succoured him, the Arab women in the tents, El-Kenneyny at Aneyza, Amm Mohammed at Kheybar, from whom this was the leave-taking:—

' "Now God be with thee, my father Mohammed, and requite thee."—"God speed thee, Khalil," and he took my hand. Amm Mohammed went back to his own, we passed further; and the world, and death, and the inhumanity of religions parted us for ever.'

The kindly men and women and the few hours of rest shine out like jewels from this narrative, which, we know even without Colonel Lawrence's authoritative word to confirm, holds within it all the sights and sounds, the spirit and the people of Arabia, 'smelling of samn and camels.' And something, at least, of their power to outlast centuries has entered into it; for it is a book built solidly, and not as books are built to-day. Therefore it has been slow in coming to its own. It is more than thirty years since the first edition was published; and now we have only reached the third. In 1888 Mr Doughty wrote in his preface: 'We set but a name upon the ship that our hands have built (with incessant labour) in a decennium, in what day she is launched forth to the great waters.' Since that time many ships have been launched and have foundered; Mr Doughty's sails slowly on to a certain harbour among the classics of the English language.

Baudelaire

Baudelaire

PERHAPS no word has been more prolific of literary misunderstandings in the last half-century than the word decadence. Critics with the best will in the world, which is the will for exact description, have called writers decadent. The unfortunate writer has been damned by a definition that no one had troubled to understand. In the general mind to be decadent is to be impure, immoral, or, in the now more frequent and really more damaging phrase, to be 'unhealthy.' Many poets were branded as decadents in the nineteenth century. All of them suffered by the name; some deserved to suffer, and some did not. Charles Baudelaire, who was the first and greatest of the line, suffered most and deserved it least. He suffers still, because every critic who is convinced of his high excellence as a poet and is anxious to elucidate it is driven to dwell on the element of decadence in the man and his work. The word is as necessary to the understanding of Baudelaire as a particular instrument to a surgeon for a particular operation.

Decadence is essentially a word of the historian who applies it to those periods in the history of a society when its old institutions are breaking down and being obscurely replaced by new; to ages when the transition is being made from one social ideal, one social fabric, to another. The word can be applied to literature, or art in general, in one of two ways. It can be used historically to distinguish the literature that is created during an age of decadence, or it can be used metaphorically to describe the literature of a period of transition between two literary ideals. These meanings are utterly different, yet the word is generally made to carry them both at the same time, as though a literary decadence were the necessary concomitant of a social decadence. Worse still, to the vagueness created by the fusion of these two meanings has been added a misty recollection of orgies under the Roman Empire. A tincture of fiddling Nero, Caligula, and Elagabalus gives a piquant flavour to the bolus of haziness. Writers and artists are called 'decadent' by people who mean that they are merely bad artists, or artists who deal with 'unhealthy' subjects. Thus a valuable word is ruined because it is used to save people the trouble of thinking.

It may be true, though it remains to be proved, that the literatures of all periods of decadence have certain elements in common; it is certainly untrue that the literature of such a period is necessarily inferior as literature. In the case of Baudelaire it is extremely necessary that we should be clear in what sense the epithet decadent is used when it is applied to him. Baudelaire is the poet of an historical decadence; he is not in any useful sense of the word a decadent poet. On the contrary, he was one of the greatest and most assured poets that France has produced. As a poet, he was strong, masculine, deliberate, classical; not a puny successor of great men, but the heroic founder of a line: and the peculiar quality of his work derives from the interaction of these two very different factors, the decadence of the age in which he lived and his own poetic strength and determination. Not that his choice of subject may not sometimes be called perverse; but the perversity of his work is the least important, the least relevant, and, to the unbiased reader, the least noticeable of its qualities. It is easy for any poetaster to be perverse; it is extremely difficult for a poet to be perverse in Baudelaire's way. For Baudelaire was not a furtive dabbler in unclean things; he was the deliberate and determined poet of an attitude to life to which we cannot refuse the epithet heroic. The driving impulse of his work was not a predilection, but a conviction.

Baudelaire was convinced that the age in which he lived was a decadence, and we who know it not only by his own passionate protest against it, but by Balzac's romantic anatomy of its corruption, must acquiesce in his conviction. The old aristocratic order had fallen; there was no new democratic order to supply its place: in the interval arose, like a growth of weeds on the site of a demolished building, as the sole principle of spiritual and social order, that reverence for wealth for its own sake which distinguished nineteenth-century France. Guizot's Enrichissez-vous marked a social nadir. It was the age of rampant industrialism and violent and abortive revolution; of the hideous and uncontrolled eruption of the great cities; of the squalor of a victorious materialism. Against this tyranny Baudelaire conceived it his duty to protest, not merely by the poetic utterance of cries of revolt but by the actual conduct of his life. The French romantic movement as a whole was animated to some extent by a spirit of protest against the sordidness of the age; but Baudelaire belonged to a curious section of the movement which had very little in common with romanticism as we conceive it now. His affinities were with the disciplined and contemptuous romanticism of Stendhal and Mérimée. This romanticism was rather a kind of sublimated realism, based upon an almost morbid horreur d'être dupe—romantic in its aspiration away from the bourgeois society which it loathed, realistic in its determination to accept the facts as they were. It was romantic also in its conception and elaboration of the attitude which it considered inevitable for the chosen spirits who would not bow the knee to Baal.

It is important to grasp these two intimately woven strands of realism and romanticism in Baudelaire and his two predecessors. This strange but natural combination plays a great part not in the literature of France only, but in that of Europe as a whole during the last century. A single thread runs through the work of Stendhal, Mérimée, Baudelaire, Nietzsche, and Dostoevsky; in spite of their outward dissimilarity, and the great differences between their powers, these men are united by a common philosophical element which takes bodily shape in their conceptions of the hero. They are all intellectual romantics, in rebellion against life, and they imagine for themselves a hero in whom their defiance should be manifested. The three Frenchmen had in common, and put into actual practice, the ideal of 'le Dandy.' 'Le Dandy' is an imperturbable being above the law, inscrutable, contemptuous of the world, silent under the torments which it inflicts upon his sensitive soul, continually experimenting at his own risk with morality, exercising a drastic discipline upon himself, and adopting, as a symbol of his inward discipline, that elegance of outward appearance which we generally associate with the word 'dandy.' On the one side the conception of the Dandy touches the romantic literary ideal of the poet in his tour d'ivoire, on the other it reaches out in anticipation towards the superman of Nietzsche and the still subtler and more impressive anti-nomian hero of Dostoevsky's novels. In both these forms it influenced Baudelaire's life as a man and activity as a poet.

From this angle it is perhaps easier to understand and analyse the almost massive impression of unity we receive from so small a work as Baudelaire's. A volume of poetry, a volume of prose (of which fully one-third is a paraphrase of De Quincey's Opium Eater), two volumes of scattered criticism, chiefly of painting, three volumes of translations from Poe—these are the complete works of Baudelaire. What is really original in them could easily be contained in three pocket volumes. Yet the abiding impression made by them is one of solidity. This is in the main because the inspiration is single and the foundations firm and invariable. As an artist Baudelaire works from a single centre; his attitude to life and his attitude to art lend each other aid and confirmation. Even his vices as a poet have the merit of being deliberate, and of contributing to the total effect at which he aimed. They are the vices proper, one might almost say essential, to his achievement. When Baudelaire is rhetorical, his rhetoric is never entirely empty; it has a dramatic propriety and significance in the mouth of the âme damnée, the rebellious angel hurling defiance at the powers of heaven. When he indulges his desire to astonish, he is asserting his immunity from conventional fears. Both these vices, it is true, betray in Baudelaire's mind some confusion between the laws of heroism in life and in art. They are not the less vices because they are intelligible. Nevertheless, it does make a difference that they are not irrelevant. A writer's weaknesses are to some extent condoned when they are seen to be the condition of his strength.

It is Baudelaire's chief distinction that, in spite of these one or two failures, he made a successful and undeviating effort to translate his ethical attitude towards life into a purely poetical gesture. He might so easily have been a poet of the confessional, pouring out his wounded soul in lyrical cris de cœur; but his 'Dandyism' helped him to a more truly poetic conception of his task. The fox might be tearing at his vitals, but there must be, if not a smile, an inscrutable expression of Spartan impassivity on his face. The self-sacrifice demanded of him by his moral creed coincided with the self-sacrifice demanded of him as a poet. That the original impulse was partly moral discounted nothing of his achievement, for he was in the fortunate position of one whose effort in life seconded his endeavours in art; and if he more often formulated his purpose in ethical terms, it was more because he was enough of a romantic to prefer the hero of life to the hero of art than because he was unable to envisage it as a poetic problem alone.

‘Bien d’autres que moi’ (he writes in L’Art Romantique), ‘ont pris soin d’appesantir sur les conséquences fatales d’un génie essentiellement personnel; et il serait bien possible aussi, après tout, que les plus belles expressions du génie, ailleurs que dans le ciel pur . . . ne pussent être obtenues qu’au prix d’une inévitable sacrifice.’

Still, in spite of this unequivocal declaration of faith, it would be a mistake to suppose that Baudelaire admitted any clear distinction between his ‘Dandyism’ and his poetry. Though he saluted the artistic heroism of Flaubert when Madame Bovary appeared, he did not particularly admire it; much less would he have admired the attitude of Cezanne towards his painting or Mr Hardy towards his poetry. He would have found them lacking in gesture.

Here again Baudelaire was fortunate. The desire for a gesture is not so dangerous in French poetry as it is in English. Traditional French prosody, and above all the prosody of the Alexandrine, is a perpetual invitation to rhetoric, just as the blank verse prosody of Milton sooner or later compels the English poet who adopts it to become more tremendous than he wants to be; but whereas the Miltonic prosody is an aberration from the true English tradition, the prosody of the French Alexandrine is the tradition itself. Wordsworth said of the English sonnet that in Milton's hands 'the thing became a trumpet'; the French poet's difficulty with the Alexandrine has always been to prevent the thing from becoming a trumpet. Luckily Baudelaire wanted a trumpet—one might almost say he wanted a cavalry bugle. The Alexandrine was made for a man possessed by the burning desire to send his challenges ringing up to heaven. Had it not been that his Satanic defiance was moderated by a Satanic sense of comme il faut, Baudelaire might have gone the way of Victor Hugo and largely wasted his lesser genius in a mere fury of blowing.

Baudelaire's power of concentration saved him from rhetorical disaster. In the matter of prosody he willingly accepted the severest limitations. He made no technical innovations himself, and he rejected some of those which Victor Hugo had made before him. He saw that for him it was much more important to blow a few blasts that were piercing than many that were merely loud; and he early set himself to the task of finding an equivalent in pure poetry to his detestation of the world and his defiance of the powers that ordained it. He sought the equivalent by making his poetry as metallic in sound and suggestion as he could; he would change the psychological oppression of life into a plastic oppression. To make concrete the immaterial is, of course, a familiar essential of the poet's activity, and the effort lies at the source of all metaphor. But Baudelaire went far beyond this phase; he made it his deliberate aim to expel all elasticity from his verse, all bright and ethereal perspectives from his vision. He built himself a house of metal and went from room to room, shutting, bolting, and barring all the magic case-ments. The surface of his vision and the texture of his verse should alike be hard and impenetrable; thus he would render in poetry his sense of the stifling oppressiveness of life. He would meet steel with steel.

His methods of achieving his end were manifold. The most obvious and the most successful is his endeavour to reduce all living things to a condition of immobile solidity. There is a curious example of this in the Rêve Parisienne, where the poet dreams of a symbolic landscape:—

‘ Je savourais dans mon tableau
L'enivrante monotonie
Du métal, du marbre et de l'eau.’

Even at the outset only one-third of his universe—the water—has any chance of moving; within a half a dozen lines he has (literally) petrified even that third.

Countries of the Mind

‘ Et des cataractes pesantes
Comme des rideaux de cristal
Se suspendaient obéissantes
À des murailles de métal.’

Here Baudelaire has indulged his obsession at the cost of an artistic blemish; his stately pleasure-house needed the movement of water to make the contrast of his motionless marble more intense and oppressive. In a poet so scrupulous of his plastic effects the blunder and the underlying motive are the more striking. But in Baudelaire the strangest things are turned to stone and brass; he speaks of a woman’s ‘granite skin’ in one poem, and in the next, ‘j’aiguais lentement sur mon cœur le poignard.’ The beautiful Dorothea, his mulatto Venus, is ‘belle et froide comme le bronze.’ His dream-land of happiness is ‘un vrai pays de Cocagne, où tout est riche, propre et luisant, comme une belle conscience, une magnifique batterie de cuisine, comme une splendide orfèvrerie, comme une bijouterie bariolée.’ It is not necessary to accumulate examples; one has but to open Les Fleurs du Mal at random to find them. Baudelaire makes solid everything he can. His very ideal of Beauty is an absolute immobility; Beauty itself declares:—

‘ Je hais le mouvement qui déplace les lignes
Et jamais je ne pleure et jamais je ne ris.’

Baudelaire

We are not surprised that Beauty should define itself in terms exactly descriptive of the inscrutable Dandy; nor even that an immobile Beauty should be a symbol of the poet's oppression by an adamant and inexorable world. In Baudelaire's vision of the cosmos, as we have said, steel is opposed to steel. The oppressor and the oppressed, are equally ruthless, equally immobile, equally conscious, and equally beautiful. Only the poet-hero knows the Adversary, but to know him is to salute the splendour of his majesty.

‘ Être maudit à qui, de l’abîme profond
Jusqu’au plus haut du ciel, rien hors moi ne répond!
—O toi, qui comme une ombre à la trace
éphémère,
Foules d’un pied léger et d’un regard serein
Les stupides mortels qui t’ont jugé amère,
Statue aux yeux de jais, grande ange au front
d’airain! ’

To this Moloch of existence the poet sacrifices himself in an ecstasy which is concealed beneath a mask of bronze. In harmony with the clangour of this meeting of metallic opposites, Baudelaire conceived himself as working like a smith at an anvil on the very words of his poems, hammering and shaping them till they rang with a steely resonance. It is something more than a metaphorical flight when he speaks of

Countries of the Mind

Savamment constellé de rimes de cristal.’

That is not fancy, but a precise description of them; they are tempered: and even if the poet had not himself given the hint, one might without any violent exercise of the imagination have compared them to sword-blades, cunningly damascened.

Within this metallic resonance which is the large and general characteristic of Baudelaire’s poetry we may distinguish many variations and undertones; or rather we may say that in one continuous and predominant physical sensation—for Baudelaire’s verse is physically oppressive—we can detect various separate pulses. Of these the most remarkable might be called an exacerbation of the image. It appears in many forms: in some it is used to give to a vague emotion the acuteness of a physical sensation, as in ‘Ces affreuses nuits Qui compriment le cœur comme un papier qu’on froisse.’ Sometimes it is a peculiar variation of the dominant endeavour after solidity which has already been discussed. Thus he writes of the beautiful Dorothea:—

Ta gorge triomphante est une belle armoire
Dont les panneaux bombés et clairs
Comme les boucliers accrochent des éclairs.’

The varieties are, indeed, too many to be separately defined; but a small collection of examples will show some of the curious tones that Baudelaire extracted from this singular instrument:—

Baudelaire

‘ Le ciel! couvercle noir de la vaste marmite
Où bout l’imperceptible et vaste humanité. . . .

Cœur racorni, fumé comme un jambon. . . .

La nuit s’épaississait ainsi qu’un cloison. . . .

Sous le fardeau de ta paresse
Ta tête d’enfant
Se balance avec la mollesse
D’un jeune éléphant. . . .

Le plaisir vapoureux, fuira vers l’horizon
Ainsi qu’une sylphide au fond de la coulisse . . .

Quand, ainsi qu’un poète, il (le Soleil) descend
dans le villes
Il ennoblit le sort des choses les plus viles. . . .

On voit un chiffonier qui vient, hochant la tête,
Buttant et se cognant aux murs comme un poète,
Et, sans prendre souci des mouchards, ses sujets,
Épanche tout son cœur en glorieux projets.’

Some of these attempted effects may be traced to the desire to astonish which is permitted to the Dandy on the condition that he himself betrays no astonishment. But the explanation would certainly not cover them all, even if the desire to astonish were not closely related to the desire to compel a response which is not lawful only but essential to the poet. Some of them are curiously beautiful; they have a novel and bizarre beauty that lingers in the mind. The Dandy is not only looking steadily at facts; he is extracting from them some quaint and vivid essence that escapes the duller or more cowardly eye. His world may be hard, repellent even, but it is full of a number of interesting things.

Nevertheless, the importance of these quaint vistas opening on to things grotesque or beautiful must not be exaggerated. Baudelaire's exacerbation of the image was destined to play a considerable part in the subsequent evolution of French poetry, and, at second hand, of our own; but he himself used it sparingly, as one aware that the method was scarcely on a scale with the large effect of solidity at which he aimed. His main road of escape from his iron-walled world lay elsewhere, and was as ample as the prison-house was huge. His symbol of deliverance was the sea. The sea appears as often in his poetry as the metals themselves. It was for him a terrestrial infinite that led 'anywhere out of the world'; and even in that famous and beautiful poem Le Voyage, the last of Les Fleurs du Mal, when the voyagers have returned with their mournful message that in every corner of the world 'the eternal bulletin' is the same, the poet calls to Death as the great ship's captain. After the failure of all voyages, a voyage remains:—

Baudelaire

'O Mort, vieux capitaine, il est temps! levons
l'ancre!

Ce pays nous ennuie, ô Mort! Appareillons!
Si le ciel et la mer sont noirs comme de l'encre, Nos cœurs que tu connais sont remplis de rayons.'

Doubtless, in the constant recurrence of the vision and imagery of the sea throughout Baudelaire's poetry, we may detect the profound impression made upon him as a young man by the voyage on which his perturbed parents sent him to cure his passion for poetry. But the sea is, after all, only a symbol; if he had not found the sea to express his intentions he would have found something else; hardly anything, however, that would have served him so well, or have exercised so universal an appeal. Even those who know nothing of Baudelaire's disdains and detestations, and would dismiss his attitude of rebellion as a mere theatricality, cannot fail to respond to the suggestion of his recurrent imagery of the sea. We may call it a simple or a naïve emotion that finds in a 'splendid ship with white sails crowding' the perfect symbol of the freedom and happiness that are hidden beyond our mortal horizon; it is a profound emotion, and, what is more, an emotion peculiarly of our time. An age of industrialism drives men to treasure the symbol of the sea and its ships. Baudelaire made a magnificent use of this great modern commonplace. 'Grand style: rien de plus beau que les lieux communs,' he notes in his

Countries of the Mind

Journal, where we also find this delicate statement of the fundamental theme:—

‘ Ces beaux et grands navires, imperceptiblement balancés (dandinés) sur les eaux tranquilles, ces robustes navires, à l’air désœuvré et nostalgique, ne nous disent-ils par une langue muette: Quand partons-nous pour le bonheur ? ’

The image appears in an innumerable variety of forms and contexts. Music is a sea opening on to he knows not what freedom:—

‘ Je mets à la voile
La poitrine en avant et les poumons gonflés
Comme de la toile.’

The lovely Dorothea sails along his memory like a ship. Again, ‘ notre âme est un trois-mâts cherchant son Icarie.’ Every desire for the illimitable, every hope that some final freedom lay behind the brazen wall of circumstance, took concrete form in this image. If in a rare moment his fascinated loathing of the tentacular town gives place to a delighted contemplation, it is because the beloved vision has interposed between him and the reality. ‘ Les tuyaux, les clochers,’ have become ‘ ces mâts de la cité.’ Here finally are two passages from the Poèmes en Prose; placed side by side they render exactly the quality of significance which the sea and the ships possessed for the poet’s mind:—

‘ Moi seul, j’étais triste, inconcevablement triste. Semblable à un prêtre à qui on arracherait sa divinité, je ne pouvais, sans une navrante amertume, me détacher de cette mer si monstrueusement séduisante, de cette mer si infiniment variée dans son effrayante simplicité, et qui semble contenir en elle et représenter par ses jeux, ses allures, ses colères et ses sourires, les humeurs, les agonies et les extases de toutes les âmes qui ont vécu, qui vivent et qui vivront ’ (Déjà).

‘ Un port est un séjour charmant pour une âme fatiguée des luttes de la vie. L’ampleur du ciel, l’architecture mobile des nuages, les colorations changeantes de la mer, le scintillement des phares, sont un prisme merveilleusement propre à amuser les yeux sans jamais les lasser. Les formes élancées des navires, au gréement compliqué, auxquels la houle imprime des oscillations harmonieuses, servent à entretenir dans l’âme le goût du rythme et de la beauté, et puis, surtout, il y a une sorte de plaisir mystérieux et aristocratique pour celui qui n’a plus ni curiosité ni ambition, à contempler, couché dans le belvédère ou accoudé sur le môle, tous ces mouvements de ceux qui partent et de ceux qui reviennent, de ceux qui ont encore la force de vouloir, le désir de voyager ou de s’enrichir (Le Port).

The sea is life, and the ship that rides over it is that triumphant, impossible beauty which haunts the mind with the promise that by its power the terrors of life may be overcome. It is only a dream, as

Countries of the Mind

Baudelaire well knew, but he dreamed it continually.

For Baudelaire was truly an âme damnée, because he was in love with the ideal. The fox of disillusion and disgust really tore at his vitals. Like Ivan Karamazov, he persisted in his determination to give God back the ticket; because his sensitiveness was such that the degradation and misery of life left him no peace. Ennui and spleen had 'magnified themselves into divinities'; they were not petulant and momentary outbreaks of emotionalism, but constant factors of his being. To maintain himself he adopted an attitude, he became Satanic after the pattern of the Miltonic Satan, whom he considered the perfect type of manly beauty; and in the parallel world of art he sought to transform the reactions of his sensibility into the elements of a cosmos of his own making, a little universe that should produce in us the emotions that had tormented him in the world of everyday. Sometimes the original emotions show through the mask he wore; not through any artistic failure on his part, for no man was ever more resolute in his determination to sacrifice himself to his achievement, but because in the later work in prose he was intentionally loosening the rigour of his artistic creed. He was looking for a more precise equivalence to his feeling. In the texture of the Poèmes en Prose we can distinguish the separate threads of emotion which are lost in the stiff brocade of Les Fleurs du Mal. The prose is more lightly and in a sense more delicately woven; the unity of effect which the little pieces give derives more from complicated harmony than from the resonant unison which marks the poetry. In his prose Baudelaire is content to be ironical, compassionate, lyrical, and symbolic by turns; each piece has the contour of a single mood, together they have the complex solidity of an attitude. There, if we look, we may find as much of Baudelaire the man, as much of his human sensibility, as we shall ever find; there his pity, his irony, his dreams have their original quality, their individuality is not submerged. And there we discover an exquisite compassion and sympathy with the oppressed, of which we may be sure none of those who denounced his immorality was ever remotely capable; and even now few people know that it was Baudelaire who wrote in Les Veuves one of the most compassionate phrases in all literature:—

‘Avez-vous quelquefois aperçu des veuves sur ces bancs solitaires, des veuves pauvres? Qu’elles soient en deuil ou non, il est facile de les reconnaître. D’ailleurs il y a toujours dans le deuil du pauvre quelque chose qui manque, une absence d’harmonie qui le rend plus navrant. Il est contraint de lésiner sur sa douleur. Le riche porte la sienne au grand complet.’

‘They are compelled to economise in grief.’ No wonder the inventor of this phrase gave toys to the waifs of Paris and watched them ‘steal away like cats who take the bit you give them far away

to eat, having learned to mistrust men,' and recorded with a delicate precision the plans four little children were making for their lives; or that the most cynical of all his cynicisms about love is the little story, 'Les Yeux des Pauvres.' The poet and his mistress are sitting outside a new and splendid café. Suddenly he is aware of a poor man holding two tiny children by the hand; all three are staring, 'extraordinarily serious,' with large and fascinated eyes into the café:—

'Non seulement j'étais attendri par cette famille d'yeux, mais je me sentais un peu honteux de nos verres et de nos carafes, plus grands que notre soif. Je tournais mes regards vers les vôtres, cher amour pour y lire ma pensée; je plongeais dans vos yeux si beaux et si bizarrement doux, dans vos yeux verts, habités par le Caprice et inspirés par la Lune, quand vous me dites: "Ces gens-là sont insupportables, avec leurs yeux ouverts comme des portes-cochères! Ne pourriez-vous pas prier le maître du café de les éloigner d'ici?"'

Tant il est difficile de s'entendre, mon cher ange, et tant la pensée est incommunicable, même entre gens qui s'aiment!'

This suppressed yet passionate sympathy with the sufferings of the poor is one of the deepest strains in Baudelaire's nature; it gives to his ennui and his spleen the decisive, creative force which a passing mood of disenchantment could never have. Unlike Verlaine, Baudelaire is a constructive poet; he works from a constant centre and builds on a firm foundation. It was easy for Verlaine to react against his first admiration for Baudelaire and say, 'Prends l'éloquence et tords-lui son cou.' He had very little to be eloquent about; but Baudelaire's moods have all the force of convictions, they have the backing of an accumulation of unforgotten injuries. Even when he is deliberately striving to express a mood, the effect is massive and overwhelming. To compare with Verlaine's plaintive songs his Chant d'Automne:—

Baudelaire

'Bientôt nous plongerons dans les froides
ténèbres;
Adieu, vive clarté de nos étés trop courts!
J'entends déjà tomber avec des chocs funèbres
Le bois retentissant sur le pavé des cours.'

is to apprehend 'the difference between poetry of an eternal tensity and poetry that is merely beautiful.' The grave austerity of Recueillement belongs to the same rare order of achievement, the highest of which French poetry is capable:—

'Sois sage, ô ma Douleur, et tiens-toi plus tranquille.
Tu réclamaïs le soir; il descend; le voici.'

There were one or two enthusiastic critics who welcomed the appearance of Les Fleurs du Mal with references to the great name of Dante. They were generous; but their instinct was sound.

Countries of the Mind

Baudelaire stands to Dante in a relation not unlike that of Keats to Shakespeare.

We need not describe in detail the misery of the poet's life. Behind his mask he waged an incessant but a losing battle against a strange paralysis of the will. Only in the last two years, during which his letters to his mother and the fragments of his intimate journal have been published, has it been possible to appreciate his sufferings. Even now much of his life remains mysterious; but enough is revealed to show how striking are the points of resemblance between him and Dostoevsky. The two men were born in the same year. Certainly Baudelaire's powers were less than those of the Russian, but had Dostoevsky died when Baudelaire did, in 1867, he would have left only Crime and Punishment of his greater novels. Baudelaire did not live to push his exploration into the possibilities of rebellion so far. But Dostoevsky would have found in him all the material for one of his inscrutable heroes. This heroic side of Baudelaire, his prolonged and passionate attempt to live up to his own conception of heroism, is the part of his private life which most excites our curiosity, for it has a direct bearing upon his work as a poet. We may take his actual existence in the under-world for granted, as we take Dostoevsky's; it is his endeavour to establish himself in a place midway between the âme supérieure of his compatriot Stendhal and the Stavrogin of Dostoevsky that needs illumination. In his journals we catch only fitful glimpses of his immense exercise of will. We grasp at odd, fragmentary phrases like 'Self-purification and Anti-Humanity' (written in English and in big letters), or 'Etre un grand homme et un saint pour lui-même, voilà l'unique chose importante,' or this—with its uncanny anticipation of a scene in The Possessed—'Le Dandy doit aspirer à être sublime sans interruption: il doit vivre et dormir devant un miroir.' And how unexpected to those who persist, like Mr Arthur Symonds in his recent study, in seeing in Baudelaire only a Swinburnian singer of 'strange sins,' will this be. 'Il ne peut y avoir du progrès (vrai, c'est-à-dire moral) que dans l'individu et par l'individu lui-même.' Yet all these professions of faith are perfectly consistent. Baudelaire's pursuit of the ideal of the rebellious angel called for a rigorous self-discipline and aimed at an ethical victory; but it also demanded enormous courage and physical endurance. The isolation of the man who adopts an individualist morality is complete; he cannot expect sympathy or even understanding. Even a friend and admirer like Théophile Gautier confessed that he knew nothing about Baudelaire the man. We see the evidence of the tortures which he suffered from his spiritual loneliness in the almost hysterical way in which he clung to the affection of his mother and of Jeanne Duval, to both of whom he was, and knew he was, quite incomprehensible.

'One cannot live in rebellion,' said Ivan Karamazov. Just as Baudelaire used the symbol of the sea in his poetry for a way of escape from the adamantine world he had made, so in his life he was haunted by the thought that a simple domesticity might liberate him from the oppression and fascination of Paris. He will live in suburban rusticity with Jeanne at Neuilly in a quiet little 'home'—it is the English word he uses; and nothing is more pathetic than his hysterical attempts to escape to his mother's villa in Honfleur. Again and again the plans are made, the day fixed. In vain. A month or more of silence precedes the inevitable letter, with its pages of feverish explanation why it was impossible. When he did break away from Paris, it was only to be drawn into the vortex of another great city; and when at last he made the journey from Brussels to Honfleur his mother herself brought him, for he was paralysed and speechless.

So, too, in his inward consciousness he dreamed of a way of escape by belief in God. In his moments of doubt of his own endurance came the thought that there still might be an explanation of all that was intolerable to him in life: the veil of the mystery might be lifted. We have for evidence the pitiful prayers which are scattered through his Journal, and the appeal with which he ends Mademoiselle Bistouri:—

'La ville fourmille de monstres innocents.—
Seigneur, mon Dieu! vous le Créateur, vous, le Maître; vous qui avez fait la Loi et la Liberté;
vous, le Souverain qui laissez faire, vous le Juge qui pardonnez; vous qui êtes plein de motifs et de

Baudelaire

causes, et qui avez peut-être mis dans mon esprit le gout de l'horreur pour convertir mon cœur, comme le guérison au bout d'une lame; Seigneur, ayez pitié, ayez pitié des fous et des folles! O Créateur! peut-il exister des monstres aux yeux de Celui-là seul qui sait pourquoi ils existent, comment ils se sont faits et comment ils auraient pu ne pas se faire?'

'Healing at the point of the knife.' Baudelaire was never to believe it wholly, but it was a possibility which haunted him. Perhaps it weakened his resolution; certainly it was a cause of that paralysis of the will—the faculty by which he chiefly lived—which most afflicted him in his later days. The poignant notes in his Journal, 'Travail immédiat, même mauvais, vaut mieux que la rêverie,' his repeated references to 'le sentiment du gouffre,' give us an inkling of what he endured.

Baudelaire was a great poet of a decadence. In other words, he was a great modern poet; for the decadence which shaped him by compelling him to revolt against it was the 'civilisation of industrial progress' which has endured from his day to our own. Baudelaire confronted the reality like the hero he strove to be; he had the courage both of his attitude and his art, and the result of his unremitting exercise of will in transforming his keen emotions is a poetic achievement that makes a single and profound impression upon our minds. Baudelaire, true to the practice of the great poet, had crystallised his experience; he had accumulated

a weight of conviction to endorse his emotions. ' Dans certains états de l'âme presque surnaturels ' (he writes), ' la profondeur de la vie se révèle tout entière dans le spectacle, si ordinaire qu'il soit, qu'on a sous les yeux. Il en devient le symbole.' We have tried to elucidate the quality which Baudelaire discerned in ' the depth of life ' and to disentangle some of the methods by which he sought to convey it to posterity. He was indeed the poet of rebellion; but the resolution of his defiance was subtly modulated by doubts and dreams which he would entertain and cherish for a while and then dismiss with an ironical contempt for his own unworthy weakness. Underneath his steely surface lay an infinity of sensitive reactions. We could have deduced it; deep resentments are born only of deep wounds, and the solidity of permanent poetry is the work only of the most delicate fingers. But the finest artist seldom permits the precise quality of his personal reaction to appear. He makes his sacrifice to his own universality. It is for us to detect where most the man shows through the texture of his work; and we may decide that Baudelaire reveals himself nowhere more plainly than in these last two verses of L'Irréparable:—

' J'ai vu parfois au fond d'un théâtre banal
Qu'enflammait l'orchestre sonore,
Une fée allumer dans un ciel infernal
Une miraculeuse aurore;
J'ai vu parfois au fond d'une théâtre banal

Baudelaire

Un être, qui n'était que lumière, or et gaze,
Terrasser l'énorme Satan;
Mais mon cœur, que jamais ne visite l'extase,
Est un théâtre où l'on attend
Toujours, toujours en vain, l'Être aux ailes de gaze.'

[MARCH, 1921.]

Amiel

Amiel

'If we look,' says Benedetto Croce at the end of the most suggestive chapter of his book on the writing of history, 'merely at the enormous amount of psychological observations and moral doubts accumulated in the course of the nineteenth century by poetry, fiction, and the drama, those voices of our society, and consider that in great part it remains without critical treatment, some idea can be formed of the immense amount of work that it falls to philosophy to accomplish.' Whether the traditionalist would call the work that Croce indicates philosophy or history or criticism is of no particular account; what is important is that it remains to be done. Until it is done the twentieth century will always be liable to be puffed up with a conceit of its superiority to a century which it has not yet troubled to understand.

It is true there are signs in England of a fashionable reversion to the Victorian era; it is being exhibited as a curiosity with patient skill. But the Victorianism which may have a present vogue is a very local and limited variety of the consciousness of the nineteenth century; it does not contain England's contribution to that consciousness. The work of isolating and estimating that contribution is eminently a work of seriousness, and seriousness—the 'spoudaiotês' for which Matthew Arnold so strongly pleaded—is not the quality most frequently demanded or supplied to-day. The very word jars on a modern ear. To be serious is to be solemn, to be solemn, portentous. Yet it is silly to approach the England of the Oxford Movement, of Maxwell, and Huxley, and Arnold, of Thomas Hardy, in a superficial mood. The depths of these men were troubled. If we can see their agonies only as grimaces, we had better leave them alone. A time when Mr Chesterton can declare publicly, and be publicly praised for declaring, that Mr Hardy is 'the village atheist brooding over the village idiot' is not the best time for attempting the work which Croce indicates.

But the time will come, and the work will be done. Not until the twentieth century is fully aware of the nineteenth and has exerted itself to put a valuation upon its achievement, will it have the strength for an achievement of its own. When the work is being done and nineteenth century England is being seen in its true relation to the European consciousness of the period, Henri-Frédéric Amiel will be one of the landmarks in the survey. He may even be a basis for the triangulation, as a piece of flat, unbroken, compact ground serves best for the certain measurement of the great peaks on the horizon.

The nineteenth century was complex and titanic, a sæculum mirabile if ever there was one, a century difficult to comprehend by reason of the magnitude of the peaks that rose from it. In it Amiel appears like one of those little convex mirrors which reflect, in bright and distinct minuscule, the colossal landscape on to which the window opens. All the potentialities are there, none of the realisations. He is a microcosm of the moral effort and moral perturbation of a century in which moral effort and perturbation reached a climax. Now that we are in the trough of the wave, weary and impatient beforehand of the attempt to penetrate into the significance of a Tolstoi, a Nietzsche, or a Dostoevsky, it is well that we should have a miniature in Amiel to remind us that this was a pigmy in the days when there were giants.

From the days of Rousseau until the end of the nineteenth century the European mind was concentrated upon a moral problem. It is sometimes said that the nineteenth century was the century of science; but it was the moral, the religious, in a word the humane interest of science which riveted men's minds. They waited on tiptoe to see what light science would cast on the problem of man's place in the universe. It was a century which accepted the fact that the universe could no longer be regarded as anthropocentric. It opened with Rousseau's intoxicated chant of freedom, proclaiming that 'man was born good.' The paraphernalia of divinely sanctioned institutions could be swept away without fear, for the kingdom of Heaven was within men. Within a few years his disciples were teaching the world that the kingdom of Hell was there also.

The problem of the nineteenth century was the problem of morality without institutions. The institution of the state was reduced to a matter of majorities and progressively worse educated majorities, the institution of the church to a department of the state or an antiquarian relic. Religion and morality might possibly be psychological needs, but they might prove to be psychological illusions or, at least, no more than psychological habits evolved for the better protection of the triumphant herd; certainly the structure of the universe and the processes of animal life provided no endorsement for them. The earth and all that is therein was a trivial incident in the incomprehensible cosmic adventure. How were men to live? Where was a sanctioned principle of conduct to be found? In pursuit of the answer arose that amazing company of 'God-seekers,' to use the simple and impressive Russian name, Tolstoi, Dostoevsky, Nietzsche, Hardy, or their fellows, like Baudelaire and Stendhal, who affected the Stoic part and turned an impassive face on the chaotic and incomprehensible world. Whatever their differences, these great figures of the nineteenth century were occupied with a single problem: to discover a morality.

To this company Amiel belonged. Probably he was the smallest and least vigorous among them, but to them he indisputably belonged. With his intellect he accepted the universe of science, with his heart he admitted the necessity of religion and morality. He spent his life trying to find a place for the one in the other. In his intense and unremitting effort to reconcile them he reached strange ecstasies and strange despairs.

He sounded in his soul the whole octave of the nineteenth century consciousness and left a record of his experiences in a book which has become, as it deserved to become, a minor classic of the century he lived in.

Amiel lived his life as a professor of æsthetics and philosophy in the Academy of Geneva. He wrote some poetry and translated more; he also wrote a little criticism. But the finest passages of his Il Penseroso are so reticent that they need the Journal to give them substance, and the best of his published criticism is below the level of the incidental estimates in the Journal. All Amiel is there. Only there did his rare and delicate gift of expression find the protective atmosphere in which it could expand; it was not strong enough to endure any but the tempered and incense-laden air of posthumous publication. The true creator does not fear to give hostages to fortune, and to deliver to the mercies of the world books in which only one half his thought is imperfectly expressed; he risks misunderstanding in the confidence that what is to come will correct the insufficiency of what is past. 'Continuez vos ouvrages,' said Galiani to Madame d'Épinay, 'c'est une preuve d'attachement à la vie que de composer des livres.' But Amiel was not attached to life; to him the thought of incompleteness and misinterpretation was a perpetual terror; and he chose, in the little work he did publish, rather to conceal than to reveal his thought, and preferred in poetry minutiae of form to adequacy of content.

Countries of the Mind

This horror of exposure which stultified the literary production of his lifetime was only a particular manifestation of the fear of life which marked him from the beginning for its own. In his inward experience it emerged as a terror of moral responsibility. Like all the elements of his composition, in the process of his painfully scrupulous investigation of himself, it assumed the most unlikely disguises. And perhaps the most striking quality of Amiel's introspection—a perfect type of intellectual introspection—is the self-deception it contained. Sometimes, indeed, he had a blindingly clear sight of his own nature, but quite as often the illusion was complete. Time after time he diagnosed his disease as la maladie de l'idéal. He was so enamoured of perfection, he believed, that he could not accept the imperfect, so desirous of the whole that he could not be satisfied with the part, whether of knowledge or even of life itself. He could not love for fear his love might be less than the perfect consummation he dreamed of; he could not give himself to work, because to know one thing perfectly meant to know all things. In other words, he refused to be anything else than God. That is, of course, an uncharitable description of a nature so fine as Amiel's; but in a nature so subtle it is peculiarly necessary to separate, even with a blunt and brutal instrument, the part of self-deception from the core of truth. That Amiel was in love with the ideal no one can doubt. Perfect truth, perfect love, perfect beauty, perfect harmony were dreams that truly haunted him.

But it was not the contrast between the poverty of the real and the richness of the ideal that froze the veins of action in him, it was 'thinking too precisely on the event'; it was fear.

The malade de l'idéal is a malade imaginaire. The ideal, if it is present to a mind at all, as it was to Amiel's, is a spur, not an obstacle, to action. When it is put forward as the cause of inaction, we may be sure that the diagnosis is romantic and untrue. It recurs continually in the earlier portion of Amiel's Journal, but it disappears in the later years. Then Amiel recognised that his disease was fear. He was afraid of the menacing universe which his mind held before him; he was devoured by the misgiving that every act was a mere venturing of the hand into the spinning cogwheels of the huge, implacable machine—'l'engrenage terrible de la souffrance humaine et de la responsabilité humaine'—just as in the microcosm of literature he felt that to express his thoughts was only to draw the clumsy misinterpretations of a hostile criticism upon his head. It was a consciousness of the sheer danger of living that drove him back upon himself; he peeped out of his tiny window on to the grim waste of life, unlit by any purpose, and he drew back in dismay.

Amiel could not take the plunge into life, not because it was imperfect, but because it was cruel. This was the fundamental verity in the man. What is of absorbing and permanent interest are the strange metamorphoses which this fear underwent in the crucible of his intellect. Melancholy and diffidence were familiar to the human spirit long before the Copernican revolution; perhaps tædium vitæ is as old as humanity. But the conviction that the universe is indifferent has opened a new chapter in the history of the 'ennui commun à toute personne bien née.' The distinction between the instinct and the intellect of Amiel is therefore logical rather than psychological. His intellectual apprehension of the indifference of the universe was the nurse, though not the parent, of his fear.

It was natural that the effort to overcome this fear in the realm of the intellect should hold the chief place in Amiel's record of his inward struggles. The process of the intellect is clear; a man's deeper evolution is not. Besides, he had somehow to prove that the universe was not indifferent. That was impossible as it has always been. An act of faith is necessary, as Dostoevsky knew when he created Alyosha. But that act of faith, in spite of all his passing self-deceptions, was impossible to Amiel, and it may even be that in this one respect his analysis was keener than that of the great Russian. Amiel tried to accept the process of becoming, of birth and death and pain in the universe, as a mighty and indivisible whole. It was one; therefore, surely, it was a harmony. Man could fall down and worship it, he could acknowledge in his soul that, like a great work of art, it could not be otherwise. To take away the suffering and the evil would be to cut the warp from the woof of the sublime pattern. Man could bow himself, not ignobly, not without joy, to this vision of necessity. Who can tell whether it was not this doubtful beatitude which entered Alyosha's soul when he fell upon the earth and wept at the vision of harmony? We do not know what lay in store for Dostoevsky's latest hero.

But Amiel, who knew this condition of frozen ecstasy, also knew that it was not real acceptance.

‘ Il n’y a pas de paix que dans la réconciliation avec la destinée, quand la destinée paraît religieusement bonne, c’est-à-dire quand l’homme se sent directement en présence de Dieu. Alors seulement la volonté acquiesce. Elle n’acquiesce même tout à fait que lorsqu’elle adore. L’âme ne se soumet aux durestés du sort qu’en découvrant une compensation magnifique, la tendresse du Tout-Puissant.—(August 16, 1875.)

Perhaps he never formulated quite clearly to himself the difference between a true religious acceptance and the ecstasy of self-immolation on the altar of the cosmic process; they are extremely subtle states of mind. The basis of the one is moral, the basis of the other æsthetic. It may be that language is impotent to distinguish these impulses in their supreme manifestations; but they are not the same. Amiel may not have defined the difference, but he knew it, as doubtless many wise old Popes in the history of the Church have known it.

One thing is necessary, Amiel repeats again and again, L’abandon à Dieu. But where and what could God be for him? Try as he may—and the agony of his effort is apparent to the least sympathetic reader of his Journal—to give his Deity substance, he finds him always dissolving away into the same indifferent and undifferentiated cosmic process. In his earlier days he had managed to persuade himself that he could enter by force of imagination into all beings and forms of life, and that this illusory expansion of the self was communion with God. When the illusion began to fail, he comforted himself, like the men of Athens, by erecting an altar to the Unknown God. ‘Sois dans l’ordre toi-même et laisse à Dieu le soin de débrouiller l’écheveau du monde et des destinées. Qu’importe le néant ou l’immortalité? Ce qui doit être, sera; ce qui sera, sera bien.’—(April 24, 1869.) There he is on the road to a pure agnosticism. Three years later his disabusement is complete.

‘La sagesse consiste à juger le bon sens et la folie, et à se prêter à l’illusion universelle sans en être dupe. Entrer dans le jeu de Maïa, faire de bonne grâce sa partie dans la tragi-comédie fantasque qu’on appelle l’Univers, c’est le plus convenable pour un homme de goût qui sait folâtrer avec les folâtres, et être sérieux avec les sérieux.’

To play a game of which you can never know the rules, to act a part of which you can never know the lines, is a difficult morality. It is true Amiel goes on to explain that this is the end of a pure intellectualism, and that the heart of man can never accept it; but he has nothing more to offer, and the passage closes on a note of complete despair.

‘ L’esprit en tant que pensée arrive à l’intuition que toute réalité n’est que le rêve d’un rêve. Ce qui nous fait sortir du palais des songes, c’est la douleur, la douleur personnelle; c’est aussi le sentiment de l’obligation, ou ce qui réunit les deux, la douleur du péché; c’est encore l’amour; en un mot c’est l’ordre moral. Ce qui nous arrache aux enchantements de Maïa, c’est la conscience. La conscience dissipe les vapeurs du kief, les hallucinations de l’opium et la placidité de l’indifférence contemplative. Elle nous pousse dans l’engrenage terrible de la souffrance humaine et de la responsabilité humaine. C’est le réveille-matin, c’est le cri du coq qui met en fuite les fantômes, c’est l’archange armé du glaive qui chasse l’homme du paradis artificiel. L’intellectualisme ressemblait à une ivresse qui se déguste; le moralisme est à jeûn, c’est une famine et une soif qui refusent de dormir. Hélas! Hélas! ’

The moral fact, as Amiel elsewhere says, is also a fact. The consciousness of sin and the longing for duty are indeed facts. But they are very variable facts which could offer hardly more resistance to his analysis than the fact of a divinely ordained universe. Was the notion of duty to which he clung so desperately more substantial than the straw clutched at by a drowning man? What was he in fact to do? To play his part in the game of Maïa? Whatever he did he would be doing that, no less than the murderer and the liar. To do good to his neighbour? But what was good? Was it good, for instance, to tell his students at Geneva the truth about the Universe as he perceived it? His conscience gave him no answer to that. To do his part in diminishing the suffering of the world? To that and nothing more the duty of the sceptic slowly dwindles down. It is, indeed, not a little; but, alas, it also may be dissolved away. Amiel did not choose the method of Dostoevsky's terrifying heroes who deliberately violated this last dictate of conscience to see what might happen, and discover whether the whisper of conscience was only the last illusion of all. Amiel was not the man to put his contemplation into action; but contemplation itself was potent enough to dissolve away the duty of diminishing suffering. The part of suffering in the history of humanity was undeniable. If it was unnecessary, then the Universe was either a chaos or the work of a satanic power; if it was necessary it was lost labour to try to diminish it. So the tender-hearted Amiel, to whom in his youth war had seemed the last futility of a blind ignorance, was driven at the last into the hateful position of justifying war.

‘Les maudisseurs de la guerre ressemblent à ceux maudissent la foudre, les orages ou les volcans;

ils ne savent ce qu'ils font. La civilisation tend à pourrir les hommes, comme les grandes villes à vicier l'air. Nos patimur longae pacis mala.—(March 20, 1880.)

These are the very accents of the philosophers of militarism. On the lips of Amiel, a year before his death, they sound strangely indeed.

Thus the last duty of man turned to ashes. Amiel spent his life in obeying a conscience he could not believe in, and fulfilling a duty that was meaningless to him. Everything he touched with those timid, delicate, reverential fingers crumbled into dust. The words remained, but the substance was lost.

‘L'être moral peut moraliser ses souffrances en utilisant le fait naturel pour son éducation intérieure. Ce qu'il ne peut changer, il l'appelle la volonté de Dieu, et vouloir ce que Dieu veut lui rend la paix.’—(September 1, 1874.)

Again it is the unsubstantial God of a pure agnosticism. Though he may have deceived himself for the moment, he knew there was no peace to be found in that submission. Not a year had passed before he declared that ‘il n'y a pas de paix que lorsque la destinée paraît religieusement bonne.’ A destiny which consists only in the things which we long to change but cannot, and a God whose single attribute it is that he wills those things, were not to be worshipped by Amiel; he could not so far abrogate his humanity.

Countries of the Mind

Nothing but Stoic renunciation was left. The word 'God' emptily reverberates through the last pages of his Journal. By some curious process of self-hallucination he declared to the last that he believed in God; but it was an assertion of the desire to believe, not of belief. He was utterly cast out from life; his rebellion had ended in nihilism, his promise in disaster. He thought back on what he had done. Nothing. Omnis moriar, he wrote bitterly. Let us hope that even then he knew that the record of his seeking was imperishable. Centuries hence, when the struggles and disenchantments and despairs of the nineteenth century may be no more real than the vague memory of an uneasy dream, Amiel will be known and loved and pitied.

Perhaps the healthy and tough-minded pity him now, if they read him. But their pity is more likely to be the pity of ignorance than understanding. Amiel's travail of mind cannot be thrust aside. It does not belong to the past, but to the present, and still more to the future. Men have discovered God in our own day. But it is doubtful whether the Invisible King is more substantial than Amiel's Maïa. God, to be God, must be seen and known and loved, or he is no more than eternal illusion, a romantic expansion of the self into a universe which is not self at all. On the one side there is religion, which can abate nothing of its claim to a truly personal God; on the other side there is an indifferent universe. Amiel's Journal is a demonstration that will hold good for all time that the attempt to find a third way between these opposites is a barren self-deception.

The search for a morality remains, unsatisfied; it even seems that it is neglected now as an unfashionable relic of a bygone era. The misty religion of the new evangelists will not provide one; and the new psychology is so interpreted that it is become a mere corrosive of responsibility. Nevertheless, an intellectual age which neglects morality will itself be neglected, for the desire to be good is one of the deepest longings of the human heart. Without the discipline of morality life wastes itself in the desert sands. A culture which is blind to this necessity is inevitably futile; it has lost the power of seeing life steadily and whole, it has lost the driving force of the creative passion which springs only from a deep acknowledgement that morality is essential to the conduct of human life. The strength of a truly great writer endures either because he builds upon the foundations of a morality which he accepts, or because he is animated by the intense desire to discover one. The greatest writers, as Tchekov said, have always had axes to grind.

Amiel's title to remembrance rests in the last resort upon his profound conviction of the necessity of morality. However dark the nihilism into which his analysis led him, he proclaimed the truth that 'le fait moral est aussi un fait.' The moral fact, it is true, was the desire for morality and not a morality, as his declaration of belief in God was a declaration of his desire to believe, not of belief. But he saw also that 'la civilisation est surtout une chose morale.' That is to say, he never lost touch with the prime reality of life. It is this moral preoccupation which gives dignity and significance to his Journal. Matthew Arnold's failure to respond to this dominant quality in Amiel makes his essay irrelevant and superficial. That Amiel had a singularly acute critical intuition is true, though Arnold managed to miss the finest manifestation of it. Amiel's analysis of Chateaubriand's relation to Rousseau belongs to an order of criticism altogether higher than the remarks on Sainte-Beuve which Arnold quoted admiringly. By discovering no more in Amiel than a literary critic who had missed his vocation he came near to proving that he had missed his own.

In the last balance the positive morality of Amiel is purely Stoic, but he was a Stoic who had a clear intuition of the insufficiency of Stoicism. Morality, he knew, was a discipline; he knew also that it was not enough to suffer the discipline: he must surrender himself to it. This act of surrender was impossible to him, but he thought he saw how it might be achieved without disloyalty to the truth his intellect declared to him.

'L'amour sublime, unique, invincible, mène tout droit au bord du grand abîme, car il parle immédiatement d'infini et d'éternité. Il est éminemment religieux. Il peut même devenir religion. Quand tout autour de l'homme chancelle, vacille, tremble et s'obscurcit dans les lointaines obscurités de l'inconnu, quand le monde n'est plus que fiction et féerie et l'univers que chimère, quand toute l'édifice des idées s'évanouit en fumée et que toutes les réalités se convertissent en doute, quel point fixe peut encore rester à l'homme? C'est le cœur fidèle d'une femme. C'est là qu'on peut appuyer sa tête, pour reprendre du courage à la vie, de la foi en Providence, et, s'il le faut, pour mourir en paix avec la bénédiction sur les lèvres. Qui sait si l'amour et sa béatitude, cette évidente manifestation d'une harmonie universelle des choses, n'est pas la meilleure démonstration d'un Dieu souverainement intelligent et paternelle, comme elle est le plus court chemin pour aller à lui? L'amour est une foi et une foi appelle l'autre. Cette foi est une félicité, une lumière, et une force. On n'entre que par là dans la chaîne des vivants, des réveillés, des heureux, des rachetés, des vrais hommes qui savent ce que vaut l'existence et qui travaillent à la gloire de Dieu et de la vérité. Jusque-là on ne fait que babiller, brédouiller, perdre ses jours, ses facultés et ses dons, sans but, sans joie réelle, comme un être infirme, invalide, inutile et qui ne compte pas.'

'It can even become religion.' When we have sifted away all the contradictions in Amiel, this positive indication alone is left in our hands; when we have followed him along all the paths by which he sought peace in vain, this road alone remains open through 'the high, unoverleaped mountains of necessity.' It was Amiel's bitter fate that he could not enter upon it. [AUGUST, 1921.

Gustave Flaubert

Gustave Flaubert, 1821-1880

THERE are two Flauberts. One was born on the 12th of December, 1821, in the surgeon's house at Rouen hospital; the other in enthusiastic minds in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. One was a broad, big-boned, lovable, rather simple-minded man, with the look and the laugh of a farmer, who spent his life in agonies over the intensive culture of half a dozen curiously assorted volumes; the other was an incorporeal giant, a symbol, a war-cry, a banner under which a youthful army marched and marches still to the rout of the bourgeois and the revolution of literature.

To distinguish these beings from each other is not so difficult as to understand how they came to be so completely interfused that the separation of the legend and the reality may appear an act of wanton iconoclasm. So much has been derived from the legendary Flaubert, so many advancing waves have borne his name on the crest of their attack, that he has acquired the dignity of an institution. We have a critic of the stature of Remy de Gourmont declaring that Flaubert is the very archetype of the creative writer, for two reasons; because he devoted his life and his personality to his work, suffering nothing to be wasted in the exigencies and delights of mere living, and because he was pre-eminently gifted with visual imagination.

It is not easy to see why the value of a writer's

Countries of the Mind

work should depend upon the completeness of his incineration on the altar of Art. A good writer has to make sacrifices, of course, but he need not (indeed, he had better not) burn himself to ashes. Greater writers than Flaubert have not felt the necessity. To one who is not a born Flaubertian the astonishing tortures he inflicted upon himself would naturally suggest, not that his genius was pre-eminent, but that his creative impulse was not of the strongest. While the truth about his visual imagination is that it was not of the finest quality. Flaubert adored images; he believed, truly enough, that the highest poetic faculty is mastery of metaphor; he fancied that when he was wholly free to write what pleased him—though when was he not?—he would triumphantly indulge his passion. Yet, in fact, Flaubert's use of imagery is almost invariably strained or commonplace, and often both. Take the similes with which L'Education Sentimentale begins and ends: neither is successful. Here is the first:—

‘Enfin le navire partit ; et les deux berges, peuplées de magasins, de chantiers et d'usines, filèrent comme deux larges rubans qu'on déroule.’

The image is forced, and it gives the wrong tempo to the opening movement. A torpedo-boat destroyer could not steam fast enough to justify it wholly, and this was a river-steamer on the Seine. The second simile is used by Madame Arnoux when she revisits Frédéric Moreau:—

Gustave Flaubert

‘ Elle s’étonnait de sa mémoire. Cependant, elle lui dit :

— Quelquefois, vos paroles me reviennent comme un écho lointain, comme le son d’un cloche apporté par le vent : et il me semble que vous êtes là, quand je lis les passages d’amour dans les livres.’

This is, indeed, not a visual image; but its discrepancy is not less remarkable for that. Had the words been given to the second-rate romanticism of Emma Bovary they might have been in place. But Madame Arnoux was designed to be Emma’s opposite. For the sake of a worn-out poetical metaphor, Flaubert was willing to make his heroine speak out of character. It would be hard to find an absolutely convincing metaphor in the whole of his work. Some of them are really comic, as this of Rosanette. ‘ Toutes ces images qu’elle se créait lui faisait comme autant de fils qu’elle aurait perdus, l’excès de la douleur multipliant sa maternité. . .’

The fact is that Flaubert did not possess the finest kind of literary discrimination. He had an unusual visual faculty which he turned to good account, but the use he made of it was primitive. Most of his descriptions are visual pageantry, sometimes impressive, sometimes beautiful, sometimes as tedious as the tail-end of a Lord Mayor’s show when we are waiting to cross the road. Of the faculty which employs visual imagery to differentiate the subtler emotions of the soul, Flaubert had little or nothing at all. The true faculty of metaphor was denied him.

Countries of the Mind

Lacking this, a writer cannot be reckoned among the great masters of style. But Flaubert lacked something more fundamental still. If we consider his works in the order they were written we are chiefly struck by the strange absence of inward growth which they reveal. The surface texture of L'Education Sentimentale is more closely woven than that of Madame Bovary, but the scope of the story itself is, if anything, less significant. Flaubert's vision of life had not deepened in the long interval which separates the two works. He saw a larger extent of life, perhaps, but he saw no farther into it; he had acquired more material, but no greater power of handling it; he manipulated more characters, but he could not make them more alive. Though the epicure of technical effects may find more to interest him in the later book, it is impossible not to endorse the general verdict that Madame Bovary is Flaubert's masterpiece. Undoubtedly the choice lies between those books, for La Tentation de Saint Antoine and Salammbô are set-pieces which will not kindle, and Bouvard et Pécuchet (which Remy de Gourmont declared the equal of Don Quixote!) cannot be redeemed from dullness by the mildly amusing bubbles which float to the surface of its viscous narrative.

We may suspect that a writer who does not really develop, the vitality and significance of whose latest work is less than that of his first, has not the root of the matter in him. And Flaubert had not. It may not be given to mortal men to understand life more deeply at the end than at the beginning of their share of it; but they can more keenly feel its complexity and its wonder; they can attain to an eminence from which they contemplate it calmly and undismayed. The great writers do this, and convey the issue of their contemplation to us through the created world which they devise. But of this unmortified detachment Flaubert was incapable. He lived and died indignant at the stupidity of the human race. As he was at thirty, so he was at sixty; in stature of soul he was a young man.

‘Récriminer,’ asks Baudelaire in L’Art Romantique, ‘faire de l’opposition, et même réclamer la justice, n’est-ce pas s’emphilistiner quelque peu?’ In those three occupations Flaubert spent all his time when he emerged from his gueuloir, and it is not too much to say that he was a good deal of a Philistine. He had a bourgeois horror of the bourgeois, and it was this repulsion rather than a natural attraction which kept him chained to his desk at Croisset. Literature was to him an ascetic revenge on life, not a culmination of it; he tore himself up by the roots and planted himself in the most highly artificial atmosphere which a considerable writer has ever breathed. Under this unhealthy stimulation he evolved for himself the doctrine of the sovereign autonomy of art.

He could do no less. Having chosen the ivory tower, he had to justify its existence. Hating life, he had to be convinced that literature was also indifferent to it. Accordingly he tried to persuade himself that the subject-matter of a work of literature was of no account. A structure of beauty could be raised upon no matter what foundation, and beauty was absolute and incommensurable.

Two things are remarkable about this æsthetic theory of Flaubert's; the theory itself, and his manner of holding it. Though it seemed to resemble the doctrine held by other French romantics of his generation, it was profoundly different. Baudelaire, for instance, who claimed for the poet the right to deal with subjects generally held to be immoral, made this claim on behalf of what he considered to be the higher morality of art. He believed that the importance of a subject was independent of the moral estimation in which it was held, but he insisted that the subject should be important. Flaubert, on the other hand, tried to believe that the significance of a subject was an unessential quality. The writer actually endowed it with importance by the beauty of the language in which he treated it. Pressed to its logical conclusion, the theory is almost meaningless, for the writer must choose a subject and must have motives for his choice. So that it is not surprising that Flaubert never wholly satisfied himself. He wavered. At one moment he asserted that 'tout découle de la conception,' at another that style was 'the soul beneath the words,' at yet another that everything in literature depended on character. These beliefs do not necessarily conflict with one another, but not one of them can really be reconciled with the notion that the subject-matter is indifferent. For some reason Flaubert was incapable of thinking the question out to a conclusion. His formulated theory of writing went no farther than the injunction—valuable enough—to think clearly, express precisely, and read aloud to test the rhythm.

All this he did, and did so well, that our feeling when we contemplate the years he spent upon works so inwardly hollow as Salammbô, La Tentation and Bouvard et Pécuchet, is one of utter dismay. It seems that it was only by accident that he stumbled on a subject of any significance at all; and indeed it was. It was not the fault of his theory; that had little influence on his practice, and was rather (as most literary theories are) a justification of an accomplished fact. His choice of subjects was governed by his temperament and his temperament was governed by his two predominant emotions: indignation and aversion. Indignation drove him to Yonville and Nogent and Paris; aversion gave him wings to fly to Carthage and the Thebaid. His realism was of disgust, his romanticism of predilection; the realism was in part triumphantly successful, the failure of the romanticism complete. Never was a literary achievement more deeply paradoxical. Flaubert's natural expression was satire, but as we know from Bouvard et Pécuchet, and as he himself also recognised, his hand was as heavy in satire as his thought was cumbersome.

Indignation and aversion, unless they find their proper satisfaction in satire, are treacherous emotions

for a writer to build on; too frequently they turn to petulance and superficiality. Flaubert was saved from this by the qualities of his character. He had an immense capacity for work, a passionate love of truth, and most important of all, he worshipped the great writers before him; as he said, 'he had the bump of veneration strongly developed.' Though he recognised, with a clearness that should be disconcerting to his own idolaters, that he was of another and a lower order than his demi-gods, he saw that they had one quality which he too might aim to possess. They were objective; they did not intrude their personalities into their work; they were content to represent and to record. Long before he began Madame Bovary his determination to emulate them in this was fixed; when he was only twenty-three he declared that 'dans la première période de la vie d'artiste il est mieux de jeter du dehors tout ce qu'on a de vraiment intime, d'original, d'individuel.' It sounds rather forbiddingly professional for twenty-three, and in fact Flaubert had a fling on St Antony before sitting down to Madame Bovary, his first real exercise in his self-imposed discipline. It was much more than an exercise, of course, for Flaubert had a passion of indignation that needed vent; but without his resolve to be impersonal it would have wasted itself in vain.

In sacrificing his personality Flaubert thought he sacrificed much. He believed that he was 'born lyrical.' Born romantic would have been nearer the truth, for we have to qualify lyrical by his repeated and truthful confession that his talent was not 'primesautier.' His natural bent was towards romantic dream and romantic tirade, and his gift of lyrical expression very small. But the strength of a desire cannot be measured by the capacity of satisfying it, and there is no cause to doubt Flaubert's sincerity when he rebelled, as he rebelled continually, against the 'ugliness' of his work on Madame Bovary. Ah, what he would do when he had a subject of his own! He was tired, tired to death of the bourgeois. It was time to drop them for ever. But the subject of his own never came. At first he imagined that La Tentation and Salammbô were completely congenial, but the illusion was brief, and though he never went so far as to declare that these subjects were ugly, his complaints and his torments were the same. It was not surprising that in his last two books he should return to the detested bourgeois. In one sense at least all subjects were the same to him; he suffered equally from them all.

Two demons stood always between Flaubert and his dreams, the demon of style and the demon of truthfulness. Of the two it was the demon of truthfulness that tormented him the more. It drove him to fantastic efforts of documentation; his researches for Salammbô were prodigious, and at the very commencement of Bouvard and Pécuchet he confessed that he had read 1500 volumes for it. Yet he seems never to have asked himself jesting Pilate's question. What was this truth for which he laboured? Had he asked, he would have been forced to reply: the truth of history, not of art. But he was never able to disentangle them. His letters sometimes make nightmare reading. He must find an actual piece of France for Bouvard and Pécuchet to farm in. It was not enough to invent the episode of their geological expedition to the coast; young de Maupassant must provide him with a stretch of real cliff where the complicated event was possible: and he wrote again and again till he got it. A passion for truth of this kind is a purely morbid condition in a writer; he must indeed be 'drunk with ink' to feel it. Such truth has no value in itself, and the search for it is bound to prejudice the truth which is proper to literature. The verisimilitude of art does not depend on documents—neither indeed does the verisimilitude of history—but upon the creative imagination and the sensibility from which the imagination is replenished. In both these Flaubert was deficient; the range of his sensibility was not large, nor his creative imagination robust. He tried to eke them out with a reference library, with the result that in all his books, save Madame Bovary and Un Cœur Simple, his tenuous characters dissolve away into their own background.

With the demon of style, as he understood style, his struggle was more successful. But in order to appraise his victory we must remember how he understood it. So many passages in his letters reveal his conception that the choice is embarrassing; one may suffice:—

Gustave Flaubert

‘Ce qui distingue les grands génies c’est la généralisation et la création; ils résument en un type des personnalités éparses et apportent à la conscience du genre humain des personnages nouveaux; est-ce qu’on ne croit pas à l’existence de Don Quichotte comme à celle de César? Shakespeare est quelque chose de formidable sous ce rapport: ce n’était pas un homme, mais un continent; il y avait des grands hommes en lui, des foules entières, des paysages; ils n’ont pas besoin de faire du style, ceux-là, ils sont forts en dépit de toutes les fautes et à cause d’elles; mais nous, les petits, nous ne valons que par l’exécution achevée. Hugo en ce siècle enfoncera tout le monde quoi qu’il soit plein de mauvaises choses, mais quel souffle! Je hasarde ici une proposition que je n’oserais dire nulle part: c’est que les très grands hommes écrivent souvent fort mal, et tant mieux pour eux.’

A style of which the greatest writers have no need, to the want of which they owe their greatness, is a dubious light to follow. It was less dangerous for Flaubert, who saw his own limitations clearly, than for those who have blindly followed him. But probably Flaubert also paid a price for his obsession; probably it distracted his attention from the content of his work and induced him to spend energies that might have gone to the expansion of his sensibility upon the painful polishing of a hollow surface; the substance which could have made it solid his starved sensibility could not provide. One dare not dogmatise. Who knows for certain that a writer by taking thought can add a cubit to the stature of his soul? Possibly Flaubert, being the man he was, made a right choice; possibly he persevered where he could make some progress and abandoned the road along which advance was barred. But the probability and the evidence point the other way. The book whose style he laboured least—a Flaubertian minimum is not as other men's—is the one by which he is chiefly remembered. The youthful Madame Bovary has a validity which he was to achieve only once again, in Un Cœur Simple. Madame Bovary alone answers to his own definition of a great work of literature; it gathers scattered personalities into a type and brings new personalities to the consciousness of the human race. Emma Bovary and Monsieur Homais are figures of this kind; they are (except perhaps Félicie) the only ones in Flaubert's work.

Flaubert began his career with what is, take it all in all, a masterpiece; he was to write no other. L'Education Sentimentale is not one. It may be life, but it is not living; it is a work of history rather than literature. Flaubert had no certain hold of his characters, and his handling of his theme at the crucial moment falls to the level of melodrama. The most famous passage in the book is the death of Dussardier:—

‘ Mais, sur les marches de Tortoni, un homme —Dussardier—remarquable de loin à sa haute taille, restait sans plus bouger qu'une cariatide.

Un des agents qui marchait en tête, le tricorne sur les yeux, le menaça de son épée.

L'autre alors, s'avancant d'un pas, se mit à crier,—

— “Vive la République!”

Il tomba sur le dos, les bras en croix.

Un hurlement d'horreur s'éleva de la foule. L'agent fit un cercle autour de lui avec son regard; et Frédéric, béant, reconnut Sénécal.

Il voyagea.

Il connut la mélancolie des paquebots, les froids réveils sous la tente, l'étourdissement des paysages et des ruines, l'amertume des sympathies interrompues.

Il revint.'

'Et Frédéric, béant, reconnut Sénécal,' has been for years the object of an esoteric admiration as a masterpiece of style. In a different book it might, indeed, have been overwhelming; in the gray monotone of L'Education Sentimentale it is a splash of discordant red. The dramatic artifice tears through the even texture of the narrative: it belongs to another world of seeing and feeling, and the measure of its discordance is our astonishment at Sénécal's surprising change. If a respectable solicitor were to slip behind a screen and reappear in a cardboard nose and a pair of huge moustaches, it could not be more disturbing than this coup de théâtre in the most laboriously realistic story ever written.

Only if style could be separated from content, the surface from the perceptions which make it solid, could Flaubert's style be praised without reserve. The distinction, as he knew, cannot be made. And Flaubert's style is sometimes perfect, sometimes bad, more often indifferent than either. It is at its highest level in Un Cœur Simple. There it follows the contour of his thought with a perfect economy.

‘ Elle se levait des l’aube, pour ne pas manquer la messe, et travaillait jusqu’au soir sans interruption; puis, le diner étant fini, la vaisselle en ordre et la porte bien close, elle enfouissait la bûche sous les cendres et s’endormait devant l’âtre, son rosaire à la main. Personne, dans les marchandages, ne montrait plus d’entêtement. Quant à la propreté, le poli de ses casseroles faisait le désespoir des autres servantes. Econome, elle mangeait avec lenteur, et recueillait du doigt sur la table les miettes de son pain—un pain de douze livres, cuit exprès pour elle, et qui durait vingt jours.

En toute saison elle portait un mouchoir d’indienne fixé dans le dos par un épinglé, un bonnet lui cachant ses cheveux, des bas gris, un jupon rouge, et par-dessus sa camisole un tablier à bavette, comme les infirmières d’hôpital.

Son visage était maigre et sa voix aigue. A vingt-cinq ans, on lui en donnait quarante. Dès

Gustave Flaubert

la cinquantaine, elle ne marqua plus aucun âge; — et, toujours silencieuse, la taille droite, et les gestes mesurés, semblait une femme de bois, fonctionnant d'une manière automatique.

Elle avait eu, comme une autre, son histoire d'amour.'

How exquisite—to descend to particulars—is the order of the words in 'recueillait du doigt sur la table les miettes de son pain'; it gives the gesture its significance and yields to the rhythm of the paragraph. And the final sentence, which opens the second chapter, is characteristic of Flaubert at his best. He was a master of the short sentence even more than the period. The effects he wrung from it are sometimes astonishing. Here the contrast between the movement which ends 'une femme de bois fonctionnant d'une manière automatique' and the short sentence which follows, is carefully modulated by the insertion of 'comme une autre' where we should not expect it. It not only gives us the very substance of Félicie, but saturates the narrative with a sense of time.

This power of awakening in us a sense of the process of time was Flaubert's most individual achievement as a writer. We might also say that wherever we are struck with the apparently inexplicable beauty of a page or a passage in his work we shall find the secret of the enchantment in this presentation of time. Un Cœur Simple unrolls a life from beginning to end in ninety short pages, and we feel every year of it drop slowly into the past. In the passage we have quoted from L'Education Sentimentale the significance of 'Il voyagea' is unmistakable, and there again Flaubert uses the division of a chapter to achieve his effect. His devices are innumerable. In the last sentence of Hérodias it is the choice and placing of an adverb. 'Comme elle (the head of Jokanaan) était très lourde, ils la portaient alternativement.' There it is too deliberate. But the first twenty pages of Madame Bovary are a splendid example of Flaubert's resource. The story is swift and unhesitating up to the eighteenth page. Charles Bovary's schooldays and the events of his first marriage flow by in a steady stream; it is one life among many. Suddenly the tempo is changed in a paragraph. Emma Rouault has appeared.

'Elle le reconduisait toujours jusqu'à la première marche du perron. Lorsqu' on n'avait pas encore amené son cheval, elle restait là. On s'était dit adieu, on ne se parlait plus; le grand air l'entourait, levant pêle-mêle les petits cheveux follets de sa nuque, ou secouant sur sa hanche les cordons de son tablier qui se tortillaient comme des banderolles. Une fois, par un temps de dégel, l'écorce des arbres suintait dans le cour, la neige sur les couvertures des bâtiments se fondait. Elle était sur le seuil; elle alla chercher son ombrelle, elle l'ouvrit. L'ombrelle, de soie gorge-de-pigeon, que traversait le soleil, éclairait de reflets mobiles

la peau blanche de sa figure. Elle souriait là-dessous à la chaleur tiède ; et on entendait les gouttes d'eau, une à une, tomber sur la moire tendue.'

It is like a sudden oasis of calm in which everything can be seen, everything heard. The languorous beauty of the last sentence echoes on like the sounds of the drops it registers. We feel that day was the first in his life for Charles Bovary.

If one were to press home the analysis of those characteristic effects of Flaubert, they would be found to depend generally on two elements, an unusual use of the verb tenses which an English reader can more easily feel than describe, and the manipulation of the rhythm. A period like this from Madame Bovary has the complicated rhythm of a fine piece of blank verse. Flaubert learnt something of this from Chateaubriand, and another part from Voltaire and Montesquieu, from whom he quoted with delight: 'Les vices d'Alexandre étaient extrêmes comme ses vertues ; il était terrible dans sa colère ; elle le rendait cruel.' A thousand sentences after that pattern can be found in his work. The quality that fascinated him in it was not so much the rhythm as the close texture on which the larger effects of rhythm depend. Each one of those pronouns helps to bind the parts of the sentence into one inseparable whole. Flaubert, as always, turned his admirations to account. He worked upon the hints they gave him indefatigably, and he fashioned for himself an instrument upon which no tones were impossible.

Because of this Flaubert is indeed a master; but he is a minor master. In the years he spent on perfecting the instrument he forgot, if he ever knew, what tunes are most worth playing; and too often in his work we hear him sounding idly for their own intrinsic beauty notes which have no part in any larger plan. He was never passionately possessed by a comprehensive theme, and he never clearly saw that the rendering of such a theme was the final purpose of all the explorations of language on which he lavished himself. His sacrifice was as pathetic as it was noble. When we read such a passage as this in his letters—and there are many of them—we feel as sad as he.

‘ Néanmoins, il y a une chose triste, c’est de voir combien des grands hommes arrivent aisément à l’effet en dehors de l’art même : quoi de plus mal bâti que bien des choses de Rabelais, Cervantes, Molière, et Hugo ? Mais quels coups de poing subits ? Quel puissance dans un seul mot ! Nous, il faut entasser l’un sur l’autre un tas de petits cailloux pour faire nos pyramides qui ne vont pas à la centième parti des leurs, lesquels sont d’un seul bloc.’

What is this ‘ Art ’ which the masters triumph by ignoring ? If they have no ‘ Art ’ what is the value of ‘ Art ’ at all ? And why call it ‘ Art ’ ? Flaubert never answered the question: the greatest writers remained prodigies for him; there was no room for them in his philosophy.

But for Flaubert, though they existed on heights unapproachable, they did exist, and he never forgot them. What are we to say of a generation that has seen in Flaubert's 'Art' the highest achievement of literature, and in Flaubert himself the type of the great writer? Were it not the fact, the collective hallucination would appear like a chapter in a fairy tale. We can see the cause of the aberration. Flaubert's 'Art' is an art which minor writers can understand; in pretending to surrender themselves to it—for a real surrender is much too painful—they have the satisfaction of manipulating a mystery. But the mystification has lasted too long. The invention of 'Art' has done no good to art, and it has interposed a veil between Flaubert's work and the general judgment. To be critical of Flaubert is to prejudice a vested interest, so large an edifice has been built upon the insecure foundation.

Flaubert came as near to the highest literary genius as a man can come by the taking of pains. Just as his example will be a perpetual encouragement to all honest artificers of literature, it will be a will o' the wisp to those who presume to measure the giants by it. Flaubert's work can never cease to smell of the lamp, but by the writing of one fine book and one perfect story, and his devoted researches into the capacity of language, he is one of the greatest minor heroes of letters. More than this, his correspondence shows him to us as one of the most lovable of all writers, for though we smile at him tearing his hair in the silence of his study, our smile is the smile of sympathy and admiration. But those who claim more for him than this would lose all, if it were possible, for they can exalt him only by deposing greater men than he. Flaubert stands in no need of such extravagant admiration, and we know him well enough to be certain that he would have resented bitterly a worship paid to himself at the cost of divinities he adored.

Stendhal

Stendhal

No one has better described the impression made by Stendhal than Goethe, who wrote in 1818: 'Er zieht an, er stösst ab, interessiert und argert, und so kann man ihn nicht loswerden.' ('He attracts, repels, interests, irritates, and one can't get away from him.') That was written after reading Rome, Naples, and Florence, which M. Edouard Champion has lately republished in his superb edition of the complete works, and the description fits the particular book perhaps a little more exactly than any of the others. It so obviously ought to be a dull work, and it so obviously is not. It has neither system nor shape; it is concerned with a society that has passed out of mind; it is studded with the irrelevant, tangential speculations of a perpetually curious mind, with odd facts of history, with long and enthusiastic appreciations of forgotten Italian operas and singers. Yet we are held. Stendhal's facts are not like anybody else's facts. They are like objects looked at from a peculiar and unexpected angle. We only half recognise them. The proportions are queer. At first they are almost silly, then they become bizarre, then fascinating, and then—at least for a period in most literary lives—all-absorbing.

Stendhal was a man of many surfaces. There are bold men who call themselves stendhaliens and profess to be adept in le beylisme; but they are not to be trusted. It is true that Stendhal had an attitude to life, a philosophy of conduct, that might be imitated. But the man who actively followed Beyle's precepts would, by the mere fact, be very different from Beyle. For this seeming rusé realist was the embodiment of timidity; this amateur of the amour-passion was one of the most backward love-makers who ever existed. In M. Arbelet's most admirable biography, La Jeunesse de Stendhal, which is published as part (and a worthy part) of the collected edition, you may read of the comedy or the tragedy of young Beyle's initiation into love at Milan. It is an unfamiliar but characteristic episode in the man's life, which was stained through and through as it were with a dye of some paradoxical uniqueness. One feels that he was born in a momentary interregnum of the Zeitgeist, just as in the actual world he happened to be educated in one of those strange schools which were the immediate product of the Revolution, where masters and pupils alike were fired by a passion for la Raison—schools which lasted barely three years, just long enough to give a unique impress to the one boy with a touch of genius who might, on merely statistical grounds, be expected to be born in the period.

If one were writing the book upon Beyle which has still to be written—it will be the work of an English critic, for no Frenchman could have sufficient detachment, or even sufficient understanding—one would begin by showing how a cornucopia of uniquenesses was made ready to be emptied upon the head of the infant Henri Beyle. M. Arbelet has gathered most of the material for a study of his astonishing parents and relations, those bourgeois aristocrats (like the Rênals of Le Rouge et le Noir) who were so much more exclusive even than the grands bourgeois of modern France. When one comes to know them a little more closely, to see them a little more clearly, than is possible through the melodramatic kaleidoscope of La Vie de Henri Brulard one comes to look upon Beyle as a kind of infant Samuel dedicated to one knows not what deity of contrariety and paradox. One feels, rather than understands, the reason of the inevitability which imposes itself upon any one who attempts even in the scope of a brief essay to define the substance of Beyle, the man and the writer. Every comparison is turned ineluctably into paradox. The outward garment of his style suggests the influence of Voltaire; in fact, Beyle hated Voltaire, and the real influence was much rather Jean-Jacques. His whole manner is that of an aristocrat of aristocrats; he was, in fact, and most profoundly, a republican, a libertarian and a radical. Most sincerely in the literary controversy of his age Beyle insisted that he was a Romantic; in fact, he detested Chateaubriand, and he was pretty exactly what we call a Realist. His lucid and exact psychological analysis recalls no one in the French tradition so directly as Racine; in fact, Beyle could not abide Racine, and most honestly and for the most substantial reasons idolised Shakespeare. 'Adorava Shakespeare' was the alternative epitaph to the one which he finally chose: 'Arrigo Beyle Milanese: visse, scrisse, amo.' The art of Shakespeare and the life of Italy—between Rivoli and the Risorgimento, be it understood—may fairly be said to have been the two passions whose rule over him endured throughout his life.

Beyle is, perhaps, the smallest of great men; but he is also one of the most compact, and his title to be called great is proved not least by the wholly peculiar persistence with which he seems to avoid all classification. He makes a queer final impression—how delighted he would have been to read it!—as of a miniature, desiccated Shakespeare, and, indeed, one can easily conceive a definition of him in terms which in a richer, riper world of perceptions would apply to Shakespeare. His universe of men was also blank between the aristocrat and the peasant, and it may be for the same reason. He confesses that because he was a bourgeois, the bourgeois had become as intolerable to him as the taste of oysters to a man who has had a surfeit of them; he had supped too full of the horrors of the bourgeoisie in childhood ever to contemplate them again. The middle-class were ciphers in his system of values, and even an ideal member of it remained a cipher, just as zero, raised to the n^{th} power, remains zero. 'Ce qui est exactement raisonnable ne donne pas prise aux beaux arts; j'estime un sage républicain des Etats-Unis, mais je l'oublie à tout jamais en quelques jours : ce n'est pas un homme pour moi, c'est une chose.' Therefore, although he was by impulse a realist, he was nevertheless a romantic because he had a theory of reality. Not all that existed in the shape of human beings was real to him. This anti-bourgeois speck in his telescope, he wrote in Henri Brulard, had been very useful to him with the characters of his novels. It was true; but the word 'bourgeois' had by that time come to denote for him not so much a social class, as a type of being. The reality of a man for Stendhal lay in his faculty of allowing all that is prudential and calculating in him to be dominated by what is instinctive and passionate.

That is a fairly complete and coherent attitude towards life; it certainly has its counterpart in Shakespeare; it is, moreover, what we might call a very good working basis for a literary artist. But it does not in the least resemble that enlightened hedonism which the 'beylistes' profess to find in their idol. Beyle, indeed, makes a poor showing as a hedonist. The overwhelming impulses of soul which he set highest, and counted most real among human capacities, the precious élans d'âme, were likely to prove annihilating to their vehicles. Indeed, they not only annihilated his heroes and heroines, Fabrice, Julian Sorel, Mademoiselle de la Môle, Clélia and the rest, but they came near to being his own undoing at one or two points of his own career. To be interesting to Beyle people must be ready to surrender their lives at the summons of a grande passion; to be interesting to himself he had to believe that the same readiness lay in him. It is therefore inexact to call him a romantic, even though he called himself one. Your true romantic is ready to surrender himself only to dreams; his élan d'âme has little or no repercussion in the visible world. The real world is altogether too sordid, and perhaps too difficult a place for him to be concerned with it. His passions are veritably passive. It was, however, the essence of Stendhal's conception of passion that it should issue, and issue immediately in act. Whether the act seems grandiose or ridiculous, momentous or merely bizarre, was of small account; it was precisely indifferent. He prefaces almost every one of his stories of la vie passionnelle in Rome, Naples et Florence with the warning that it will seem ridiculous, but the implication behind the warning is that if you find it ridiculous, you are a poor creature. The faculty which he admired in men had two complementary aspects. Looked at from the inside it was passion, the élan d'âme; from the outside it was energy, la force. This is the meaning of his paradox: 'J'aime la force, et de la force que j'aime, une fourmi peut en montrer autant qu'un éléphant.'

Stendhal's attitude to life was not romantic, therefore; it was tragic. It falls in between the classical and the romantic attitudes. His ideal is neither the harmonious man of the Greeks (εὐεικής) nor the gesticulating, dreaming hero of romanticism; it is, really, the hero of a Shakespearean tragedy, a hero who plays his part in the active life of a real world. In order to give literary expression to this tragic hero-worship, Stendhal had to become what is generally called a realist. But just as the term 'romantic' has to be given an unfamiliar and improper meaning to fit him, 'realist' has also to be given a precise and particular sense. Realist in the proper critical meaning he was not. A good deal more than half human life was supremely uninteresting to him. But the part he was interested in had a sort of super-reality to compensate. The problem was how to convey and communicate this, how (in the expressive phrase of the working artist) 'to get it across.' An unobtrusive sentence in Rome, Naples et Florence—we are endeavouring to explain Stendhal on the evidence of this single book—gives us his solution. 'On n'a jamais du feu,' he writes, 'qu'en écrivant la langue qu'on parle à sa maîtresse et à ses rivaux.'

Now there is much more in Stendhal's style than is indicated here; but that dictum contains the solid basis of some of his most remarkable achievements—passionate episodes expressed in the natural language of passion. On the creative side one can think immediately of a dozen passages in the two great novels where the theory is superbly exemplified—for instance, the 'Qu'avez-vous dans la poche de côté de votre habit?' of Mathilde de la Môle—on the critical, it is a main count in his—surely convincing—case against Scott. 'Ses personnages passionnés semblent avoir honte d'eux-mêmes'; therefore they are unreal. This principle is the chief of the two tendencies that unite to form Stendhal's 'realism.' From his childhood upwards he was, in regard to literature, a dissatisfied rather than a disillusioned romantic. M. Arbelet has unearthed a singularly interesting passage from one of his unpublished notes which bears upon this. It was written before he was twenty:—

‘ Dans le romans on ne nous offre qu’un nature choisie; nous nous formons nos types de bonheur d’après les romans. Parvenus à l’âge où nous devons être heureux . . . nous nous étonnons de deux choses: la première, de ne pas éprouver du tout les sentiments auxquels nous attendions; la deuxième, si nous les éprouvons, de ne pas les sentir comme ils sont peints dans les romans.’

Two years later he re-read his note, and added: ‘Voilà l’histoire de ma vie; mon roman était les ouvrages de Rousseau.’ Stendhal himself was destined to offer to future generations a nature choisie, more sedulously selected, perhaps, than that of any other considerable novelist. It was not the ignoring of half reality that shocked him, but being unreal in the expression of the reality you chose. Because he was consistently and profoundly a ‘romantic,’ he hated with a threefold hatred romantic falseness and pomposity; because he really had a tragic attitude to life, the high falutin’ of French classical tragedy goaded him to a frenzy. It was making his heart-felt realities ridiculous. From this he directly derived his detestation of the phrase and the circumlocution, which remained with him all his life, and his at first sight strange desire, which lasted to middle age, to write a good comedy. An instinct told him that the drama was the most perfect vehicle for his tragic view of life; another instinct told him that a genre in which you had to write coursier for cheval and the precious word pistolet was taboo, was intolerable. To get natural speech on to the stage, he must write comedy. It may seem a fantastic conclusion; fantastic it must seem if you have read the outline of any of his projected 'comedies'—irrefutable evidence that he had not a shred of a sense of humour—but yet inevitable.

The other component of his style, a bare and vigorous clarity of analytical exposition, came from two sources. He was, as we have said, a devout believer in the tragic attitude. Tragic heroes were real people; he had met plenty of them in the Italian society he loved. He wanted to prove that they existed, to take them to pieces, as it were, in the intervals when they were not expressing élans d'âme in the natural language of passion. Here the ideologists who had been triumphant in the French educational system for the three brief and impressionable years he spent at the Ecole Centrale at Grenoble lent him powerful aid. Those forgotten psychologists, Destutt de Tracy and Condillac, whose names recur so often in his pages, were indeed his masters of method here. Hence came the passion for la lo-gique which in his curious drawl he so often impressed upon Mérimée, and his recourse to the Code Napoléon as a model of descriptive style. His education and the demands of his theory of life and art worked together for good. His heroes, being heroes of action, were saved from perishing in a maze of super-subtle psychology; since their supreme moments had to be expressed in the natural language of passion, they were also saved (with all due deference to weighty, but nevertheless heretic opinion) from being desiccated.

Stendhal, in brief, was a tragic realist. Tragic realism is, on the whole, an unusual kind; but some of the greatest works of literary art belong to it, the Medea and Antony and Cleopatra, Anna Karenina and Jude the Obscure. Stendhal differs from the writers called up by these names in that he held his faith a perceptible shade more naively than they. It was for him not merely the attitude of an artist towards life, not merely a philosophy which enabled the artist to express his vision of the truth and quality of life, it was also, and perhaps chiefly, a philosophy of conduct. Tragic heroes did not merely exist because their destiny was forced upon them; it was man's duty to be one. The first thing was to be une âme supérieure (his beloved phrase), the second to assert it in act, the third—and a bad third—was to write about it. And here is the reason why, although there is no real incongruity in naming Stendhal with Euripides and Shakespeare and Tolstoy and Hardy, a vital difference remains. To a casual glance it presents itself as a constant amateurishness in Stendhal the artist. We must look deeper than that, however; and, looking deeper, we shall discover it to be a profound naivety. What satisfies only a part of the great writer's mind satisfied the whole of his: in other words, Stendhal was even less a creator of heroes, than a hero-worshipper.

A Critical Credo

A Critical Credo

It is a waste and weary labour to open up again the old question of reviewing and criticism. On the one hand, there should be no distinction between them; the reviewer's business is to criticise the book before him. But too often in practice the reviewer is expected to compile a library list for the average unintelligent reader. On the other hand, economic necessity nowadays compels the critic to become a reviewer. So that the valuable modern distinction is not so much the distinction between the critic and the reviewer, as the impossibilists frequently urge, as that between the critic-reviewer and the puff-reviewer. We must leave out the puff-reviewer. God will reward him as surely as his employer does.

Speaking of criticism, Remy de Gourmont said that 'the whole effort of a sincere man was to erect his personal impressions into laws.' That is the motto of a true criticism, conscious of its limitations and its strength. The emphasis falls even more decidedly upon the law-making than upon the personal basis of the impressions, for that is inevitable. The man who is content to record his own impressions, without making an effort to stabilise them in the form of laws, whatever he is, is not a critic. A law or rule, or rather a system of laws or rules, is necessary to the critic; it is a record of all his past impressions and reactions; but it must be his own law, his own system, refined by his own effort out of his own experience. Otherwise he is a pedant and not a critic.

The function of criticism is, therefore, primarily the function of literature itself, to provide a means of self-expression for the critic. He begins like any other writer, with the conviction (which may of course be an illusion) that his views and conclusions on the subject-matter which is literature are of importance in themselves and to others; and he proceeds to promulgate and propagate them. Like any other writer, he stands or falls in the long run, by the closer or more remote approximation of his views to the common experience of that comparatively small fraction of the human race which itself comes to conclusions about life and literature, which is the concentrated record of life. As Dr Johnson said:—

‘Nothing can please many and please long, but just representations of human nature. Particular manners can be known to few, and therefore few only can judge how nearly they are copied. The irregular combinations of fanciful invention may delight awhile, by that novelty of which the common satiety of life sends us all in quest; but the pleasures of sudden wonder are soon exhausted, and the mind can repose only on the stability of truth.’

The critic stands or falls by the stability of his truth, and necessarily by his skill in communicating his truth.

That the critic has to interest his readers is true,

but in exactly the same sense as it is true that every writer has to interest his readers. He does not have to aim at being more interesting than other writers. This is one of the prime heresies of modern criticism. Its adherents appear to hold that a critical article is a kind of knockabout turn. Unless the critic is turning a somersault or making a grimace in every sentence, he is dull. Another, and more persuasive heresy is that it is the critic's business to make the best of a bad book by picking out the one or two plums that have wandered into the wilderness of dough. A critic, argue its adherents, has to communicate 'gusto' to his readers, no matter what book he may be writing about. These seem to me to be pure heresies, and the critics who embrace them will surely be forgotten.

Criticism is a particular art of literature. It is possible not to like the art, and possible for the critic to regret that his art is not liked. But it is not, or ought not to be possible for a critic to play the traitor to his art in order to get a bigger audience for his raree-show. Because a sculptor knows that sculpture is not popular, he does not paint moustaches on his figures or plant billycock hats on the top of their heads. The critic's business is to express himself by expressing his opinion on the work of literature before him. He has therefore to make sure that his opinion is his true opinion; he has to safeguard himself against accidental and temporary disturbances of his sensibility. Hence the need for a system of principles, refined out of his more constant reactions, to control momentary enthusiasms and passing dis gusts.

Moreover, he is concerned to elucidate the significance of the work before him, for his verdict is a verdict as to significance. A work of literature may possess significance of various kinds; it may have historical, ethical, or æsthetic significance; that is, it may have importance at a particular phase of the human consciousness, or it may be valuable as expressing a particular attitude towards human life, or it may have more or less of a certain kind of artistic perfection which compels a peculiar artistic emotion in the reader. A work may have significance of one of these kinds, or all of them, or any combination of them. A critic is bound to have a predisposition towards one of these kinds of significance; he will be predominantly a historian, like Sainte-Beuve, a moralist like Matthew Arnold, or a technician like Dr Bridges. He ought to be aware of his predisposition and alert to prevent it from running away with him. A perfect critic would combine all these predispositions in equal parts, but perfect critics are at least as rare as perfect writers. It is as much as one can ask that a critic should try to correct his predisposition by training his appreciation of other kinds.

Once criticism is accepted as an independent literary art, there need be no heart-searching among critics because they have so little practical influence on the sale of books. That is the fact in England at any rate. It is a hundred times more profitable to an author for the Daily Mail to declare 'This book will be a success' than for the best critic on the Times Literary Supplement to give exact and convincing reasons why the book ought to be a success. Critical articles and essays are read for themselves; at their best they are perfectly self-contained; they do not demand that the reader should dash out and purchase the books which they discuss, and as often as not they are read with the greatest interest by those who are already themselves profoundly familiar with the subject.

Putting a valuation upon new books is perhaps the least valuable, as it is certainly the most dangerous, part of criticism. It is almost impossible for a literary critic to be really sincere in dealing with contemporary production. It is as difficult for him to tell the truth about the bad work of men who have done good, as to tell the truth about the good work of men who have done bad. In the first case his hand is checked by fear of doing harm, in the second by the fear of doing good. Again, it is intolerable to be severe to a well-meaning beginner, although a critic knows that the road to hell is paved with good intentions. There are too many thorns in the path of criticism of contemporaries. For we have not even mentioned the personal resentment too often cherished by our victims. The dangers of log-rolling are at least equalled by the dangers of revenge. A successful author, however much he may be dubious of the genuineness of his own powers, cannot help believing that his success is somehow due to his

Unfortunately, few critics are in the happy position of being able to write about contemporaries only when they can sincerely praise them. For the most part they have to conform to the exigencies of reviewing, to write on texts they could not choose, to consider susceptibilities that are an obstacle to their free expression. No doubt the English tradition of anonymity is a defence against some of these evils. But it leaves the door open to other worse ones. A critic does not care to hide behind an editorial 'we' when he attacks a writer; nor on the other hand is it good to be compelled always to hide one's light under a bushel. A good criticism is as much a work of art as a good poem; its author deserves his reward in reputation as well as money. Besides, if his readers are not permitted to distinguish his work they cannot follow the sequence and evolution of his ideas. A critic cannot be always enunciating his principles. What looks like the veriest dogmatism in an isolated review, may, if put into relation to other utterances, be seen to have a convincing scheme of values behind it.

Criticism is an art. It has its own technique. Ideally, at least, this technique would have its different perfection for each several critic. But we may outline so much of the method as seems to be essential to the most important kind of criticism, appreciation.

First, the critic should endeavour to convey the whole effect of the work he is criticising, its peculiar uniqueness. Second, to work back and define the unique quality of the sensibility which necessitated this expression. Third, to establish the determining causes of this sensibility. (Here the relevant circumstances of the writer's life have their proper place.) Fourth, to analyse the means by which this sensibility was given expression, in other words, to conduct a technical examination into the style. Fifth, a still closer examination of a perfectly characteristic passage, that is, a passage in which the author's sensibility is completely expressed. This fifth and final movement is really a return to the first, but with the important difference that the relevant material has been ordered and placed before the reader.

The various phases in this symphonic movement of an ideal criticism may, of course, be ordered quite differently. The historical or the ethical critic will enlarge more on the nature of the sensibility, its value in itself and its relation to other types of sensibility; he will pay little or no attention to the means by which this sensibility is expressed. He will not be a worse critic for that, but he will be a less literary critic. On the other hand, the critic who is unable to adjudicate between the values of various kinds of sensibility has no means of distinguishing between great art and perfect art. That judgment is essential to a true criticism, in spite of (or rather in virtue of) the fact that it is in the last resort an ethical judgment.

Countries of the Mind

There is not much need to worry ourselves about the function of criticism any more than we worry about the function of poetry. Both are arts; both have to give delight; both have to give the delights which are proper to themselves as arts. If it gives this delight criticism is creative, for it enables the reader to discover beauties and significances which he had not seen, or to see those which he had himself inglimpsed in a new and revealing light. What, I think, we may reasonably ask, is that criticism should be less timid; that it should openly accept the fact that its deepest judgments are moral. A critic should be conscious of his moral assumptions and take pains to put into them the highest morality of which he is capable. That is only another way of saying that the critic should be conscious of himself as an artist. He should be aware of the responsibilities imposed by his art; he should respect the technique of his craft. He should not be cheap, he should not be shallow, he should not be insincere, either in praise or blame, but above all in these modern times, he should not be insincere in praise.

Old England

BERNARD GILBERT

Royal 8vo, Cloth, 20/- net

A God's-Eye view of a village. This book is unique in English literature both in conception and treatment. The author presents a whole community to the reader, taking for his subject our largest social unit—an English village—where everybody knows everything about every one. He has taken a typical village during one day of the war and given a camera obscura presentment of the multitudinous intrigues, ambitions, desires, disputes, relationships, and interests which thread its fabric so closely. There is no hero or heroine, for the author presents some hundreds of characters, each all important to himself. These speak their own thoughts, throw startling sidelights on their neighbours; and from the whole, a picture of a village community takes definite shape. The author has snapped his village at one instant on one day, so that there is no 'action.' The village is frozen motionless whilst the reader inspects each inhabitant. There is no sentimentalism, no 'kailyard' gloss; the villagers expressing themselves with immense force from the Earl to the mole-catcher. Mr Gilbert has done intensely for the English countryside what Balzac did for his nation on a great scale. Not only is each of the great array of characters set forth vividly, but the larger problems of the countryside are illuminated from various angles. A map of the village shows every cottage, some fifty genealogical trees explain the relationships of the villagers, and a 'Who's Who' gives full information about each inhabitant. The author has taken three years to write this book, and it is the fruit of a life-time's close observation. All who were born in the country or have any interest in rural life and problems must be interested in Old England.

The Carpenter and His Kingdom

DR ALEXANDER IRVINE

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 7/6 net

Dr Irvine has already secured a very high place in the affections of the people of this country through his books, My Lady of the Chimney Corner and The Souls of Poor Folk. The Carpenter and His Kingdom, as the name denotes, is a Life of Christ, a re-interpretation of His life as seen by a very simple yet very subtle, very human yet very wise idealist and Christian. No writer on social tendencies after the war has failed to point out the great loss of prestige suffered by the Churches. Speaking broadly, they are regarded with a disinterested tolerance almost amounting to contempt by the great majority of people, and this attitude has as its general effect a marked decrease in 'belief' in Christianity. Dr Irvine's book may prove a very real antidote to that progressive agnosticism, for he still believes that the Life of Christ is the greatest example mankind has ever been given, and that the influence of His message is vastly greater than that of any other single influence in history. But to show that he has to draw a new picture of Christ emphasising His Humanity as well as His Divinity, and make His teaching intelligible to a Society still hardly approaching convalescence after a prolonged and virulent disease. It is an original, beautiful, and timely book.

A London Mosaic

W. L. GEORGE

Small Crown 4to, Cloth 15/- net.

Illustrations by P. Forbes-Robertson

A series of brilliant satirical sketches of London places and London people by one of the most popular novelists of the day. Mr George is always interesting and his point of view original and challenging. He knows London intimately and loves her well, but his affection does not blunt his critical sense.

To go with him to the Café Royal and listen as he points out and discusses the great ones sitting therein; to follow him on his pilgrimage 'In Search of Vice'; to accompany him to theatre or music hall, are most amusing and instructive experiences which no lover of London should miss. Mr Philippe Forbes-Robertson's illustrations perfectly interpret the mood of the book.

South with Scott

CAPT. E. R. G. R. EVANS

C.B., D.S.O., R.N.

Demy 8vo, Cloth, 10/6 net

With photogravure portrait of Captain Evans

Captain Evans was second in command of the British Antarctic expedition commanded by Captain Scott, and took over Captain Scott's position as leader after his death. It will be remembered that, during the war, Captain Evans was in command of H.M.S. Broke, which, together with H.M.S. Swift, engaged six German destroyers, sinking two and torpedoing a third. It is an interesting, intimate, racy, and absorbing account of the expedition compressed into a comparatively small compass, and fully brings out the intense difficulties the expedition had to face, the heroism displayed by every member of the party, and the magnificent scientific results obtained.

Labour: The Giant with the Feet of Clay

SHAW DESMOND

Demy 8vo, Cloth, 10/6 net

Mr Shaw Desmond is very well known as a versatile writer and as a great champion of the Labour Cause. His book, therefore, is of singular interest at the present time. It is a critical and sympathetic analysis of the Labour Movement from the inside, by a man who, after being a member of the Labour Party for fourteen years, is frankly disillusioned. In what amounts to a sweeping but reasoned indictment, the writer shows the 'feet of clay' of the Labour Movement, and claims that though outwardly united the movement is split from crown to heel by fundamentally opposed ideals, tactics, and objectives, that it might collapse at any moment, and that such 'success' as has been obtained has been purchased at the price of principle. In so doing he gives many vivid and revealing portraits of great Labour figures of the last generation, from Keir Hardie to Rosa Luxemburg, 'the Red Tigress.' The book is not merely destructive, the latter portion is given over to a constructive examination of the problems facing democracy with a very interesting foreshadowing of what the writer calls 'The New Democracy' or 'The Spiritual Democracy.' He shows not only how Labour may set its house in order but how the House of Society itself may be saved from that 'unrest' which is slowly destroying it. Mr Desmond's writing is at once stimulating and suggestive, instructive and illuminating, and will certainly be widely discussed.

The Island of Youth

EDWARD SHANKS

Author of The Queen of China, The People of the Ruins, etc.

Small Crown 8vo, Cloth, 5/- net

The Island of Youth is the fourth volume of verse by a poet whose powers have been steadily maturing. Two years ago Mr Shanks' The Queen of China won the Hawthornden Prize, and the present volume contains all the poems he has since written. It contains a long poem, a beautiful idyll in blank verse, and a number of shorter poems. Mr Shanks's language is refreshingly pure and his rhythm refreshingly musical, in an age which has made many attempts to glorify gibberish and raucous discord. He is, as all good poets must be, at once original and in the stream of national tradition, and in no respect more traditional than in his affection for and knowledge of the English landscape which has breathed its fragrance into so much of our great poetry in all ages. Those who know his previous books, or the selections from them in Georgian Poetry, do not need to be told this, and those unacquainted with Mr Shanks's previous work can be most emphatically assured that they will not be disappointed in The Island of Youth. It is one of those books with which bring about an ever deepening admiration and love.

Ibsen and His Creation

JANKO LAVRIN

Crown 8vo, Cloth, 7/6 net

This is a further contribution to 'psycho-criticism' by Mr J. Lavrin, whose able study of Dostoevsky was so favourably received. His aim is to present a new and original solution of the central problem of Ibsen, and to show how Ibsen's individual psychological conflict is worked out in his plays.

Mr Lavrin reveals in a new light the great significance of Ibsen as a representative of modern consciousness, and in so doing illuminates not only Ibsen's dilemma but also our own.
